cruelty.

So whilome learn'd that mighty Jewish swain,
Each of whose locks did match a man of might,
To lay his spoils before his leman's train:

So also did the great Cetean knight,
For his love's sake, his lion's skin undight:
And so did warlike Antony neglect
The world's whole rule, for Cleopatra's sight.
Such wond'rous pow're has women's fair aspect,
To captive men, and make them all the world reject.

§ 29. Boar.

AND then two boars with rankling malice met,
Their goary sides, fresh bleeding, fiercely fret,
Till, breathless both, themselves aside retire,
Where foaming wroth their cruel tusks they whet,
And trample th' earth the while they may respire:
Then back to fight again, new breathed and entire.

§ 30. Bower of Bliss.

THENCE passing forth, they shortly do arrive
Whereat the Bower of Bliss was situate;
A place pick'd out by choice of best alive,
That nature's work by art can imitate;
In which whatever in this worldly state
Is sweet and pleasing unto living sense,
Or that may daintiest fantasie aggrate,
Was poured forth with plentiful dispense,
And made there to abound with lavish affluence.

Goodly it was enclosed round about,
As well their enter'd guests to keep within,
As those unruly beasts to hold without;
Yet was the fence thereof but weak and thin:
Nought fear'd their force that fortilage to win,
But wisdom's powre and temperance's might,
By which thē mightiest things efforded bin:
And eke the gate was wrought of substance
light,
Rather for pleasure than for battery or fight.

It framed was of precious yvory,
That seem'd a work of admirable wit;
And therein all the famous historie
Of Jason and Medæa was ywrit;
Her mighty charmes, her furious loving fit,
His goodly conquest of the golden fleece,
His falsed faith, and love to lightly flit,
The wondred Argo, which invent'rous peece
First through the Euxian seas bore all the flow'r of Greece.

Ye might have seen the frothy billowes fry
Under the ship, as thorough them she went,
That seemed waves were into yvory,
Or yvory into the waves were sent:
And other where the snowy substance sprent,
With vermill-like the boyes blood therein
shed,

A piteous spectacle did represent;
And otherwhiles with gold besprinkled,
It seem'd th' enchanted flame which did Creüsa wed.

All this and more might in this goodly gate
Be read; that ever open stood to all

Which thither came ; but in the porch there sate

A comely personage of stature tall,
And semblance pleasing more than natural,
That travellers to him seem'd to entice ;
His looser garments to the ground did fall,
And flew about his heels in wanton wise,
Not fit for speedy pace or manly exercise.

The foe of life, that good envies to all,
That secretly doth us procure to fall,
Through guileful semblaunce which he makes us see,

He of this garden had the governall,
And pleasure's porter was devis'd to be,
Holding a staffe in hand for more formalitie.

Thus being entred, they behold around
A large and spacious plaine on every side
Strow'd with pleasaunce, whose faire grassie
ground

Mantled with green, and goodly beatifide
With all the ornaments of Florae's pride,

Wherewith her mother Art, as half in scorne
Of niggard Nature, like a pompous bride,
Did deck her, and too lavishly adorne,
When forth from virgin bowre she comes in th' early morne.

Thereto the heavens always joviall,
Lookt on them lovely, still in stedfast state,
Ne suffer'd storme nor frost on them to fall,
Their tender buds or leaves to violate,
Nor scorching heat, nor cold intemperate,
T' afflict the creatures which therein did dwell ;

But the mild air with season moderate
Gently attemptred and disposed so well,
That still it breathed forth sweet spirit and wholesome smell.

More sweet and wholesome than the pleasant hill

Of Rhodopè, on which the nymph that bore
A giant-babe, herselfe for grieve did kill ;
Or the Thessalian Tempè, where of yore
Faire Daphne Phœbus' heart with love did gore ;
Or Ida, where the gods lov'd to repaire,
When-ever they their heavenly bowres forlore ;
Or sweet Parnasse, the haunt of muses faire ;
Or Eden, if that aught with Eden mote compare.

Till that he came unto another gate,
No gate, but like one, beeing goodly dight
With boughes and branches, which did broad dilate,

Their clasping armes, in wanton wreathings intricate.

So fashioned a porch with rare divise,
Archt over head with an embracing vine,
Whose bunches hanging downe, seem'd to entice

All passers by to taste their lushious wine,
And did themselves into their hands incline,
As freely offering to be gathered :

Some deep empurpled as the hyacint,
Some as the rubine laughing, sweetly red,
Some like fair emeraudes not yet ripened.

And them amongst, some were of burnisht
So made by art, to beautifie the rest, [gold,

Which did themselves amongst the leaves
enfold,

As lurking from the view of covetous guest,
That the weak boughes, with so rich load op-
Did bow adown as over-burthened. [prest,

There the most dainty paradise on ground,
Itself doth offer to his sober eye,

In which all pleasures plentifully abound,
And none does others happiness envie :

The painted flowres, the trees upshooting hie,
The dales for shade, the hills for breathing
place,

The trembling groves, the crystall running by ;
And that which all fair works doth most aggrace, [place.

The art which wrought it all appeared in no
One would have thought (so cunningly the rude

And scorned parts were mingled with the fine)
That Nature had for wantonness ensude

Art, and that Art at Nature did repine ;
So striving each the other to undermine,
Each did the other's work more beautify ;
So differing both in willes, agreed in fine :

So all agreed through sweet diversitie,
This garden to adorne with all varietie.

And in the midst of all, a fountaine stood,
Of richest substance that on earth might be,

So pure and shiny, that the silver flood
Through every channell running, one might
Most goodly it with pure imageree [see ;

Was over-wrought, and shapes of naked boyes,
Of which some seem'd with lively jollitee

To fly about, playing their wanton toyes,
While others did themselves embay in liquid
joyes.

And over all, of purest gold, was spread
A trayle of ivie in his native hew :

For the rich metall was so coloured,
That wight that did not well advised view,
Would surely deem it to be ivie true :

Low his lascivious armes adowne did creep,
That themselves dipping in the silver dew,

Their fleecie flowres they tenderly did steepe,
Which drops of crystall seem'd for wantonness to weepe.

Infinite streames continually did well
Out of this fountaine, sweet and faire to see,

The which into an ample laver fell,
And shortly grew to so great quantitie,
That like a little lake it seem'd to bee ;

Whose depth exceeded not three cubits height, [see

That through the waves one might the bottom
All pav'd beneath with jaspers shining bright,

That seem'd the fountaine in that sea did sayle upright.

And all the margent round about was set
With shady lawrell-trees, thence to defend

The sunny beames, which on the billows bet,
And those which therein bathed, mote offend.

§ 31. Bower of Proteus.

His bowre is in the bottom of the maine,
Under a mighty rock, 'gainst which do rave
The roaring billows in their proud disdaine ;

That with the angry working of the wave,
Therein is eaten out an hollow cave,
That seems rough mason's hand, with engine keen,
Had long while laboured it to engrave:
There was his wonne, ne living wight was seen,
Save an old nymph, hight Panope, to keep it clean.

§ 32. Bull.

As salvage bull, whom two fierce mastives bait,
When rancour doth with rage him once begore,
Forgets with warie ward them to await,
But with his dreadful horns them drives afore,
Or flings aloft, or treads down in the flore,
Breathing out wrath, and bellowing out disdain,
That all the forest quakes to hear him roar.

Another.

As two fierce bulls, that strive the rule to get
Of all the herd, meet with so hideous maine,
That both rebutted, tumble on the plaine:
So these two champions to the ground were feld.

Another.

LIKE a wild bull, that being at a bay,
Is baited of a mastiff and a hound,
And a curre-dog, that do him sharp assay
On every side, and beat about him round;
But most the curre, barking with bitter sound,
And creeping still behind, doth him incomber,
That in chauffe he digs the trampled ground,
And threats his horns, and bellows like the thunder.

§ 33. Calumny.

IT is a monster bred of hellish race,
Then answer'd he, which often had annoy'd
Good knights and ladies true, and many else destroy'd.
Of Cerberus whylome he was begot,
And fell Chimæra in her darksome den,
Through foule commixture of his filthy blot,
Where he was fostred long in Stygian fen,
Till he to perfect ripeness grew, and then
Into this wicked world he forth was sent,
To be the plague and scourge of wretched men:
Whom with vile tongue and venomous intent
Ill sore doth wound, and bite, and cruelly torment.

§ 34. Cannon.

As when the devilish iron engine wrought
In deepest hell, and fram'd by furies' skill,
With windy nitre and quick sulphur fraught,
And ramm'd with bullet round ordain'd to kill,
Conceiveth fire, the heavens it doth fill
With thundering noise, and all the aire doth choke,
That none can breath, nor see, nor hear, at will,
Through smouldry cloud of duskish stinking
That th' only breath him daunts who hath escapt his stroke.

§ 35. Charity.

SHE was a woman in her freshest age,
Of wondrous beauty, and of bountie rare,
With goodly grace and comely personage,
That was on earth not easy to compare;
Full of great love, but Cupid's wanton snare
As hell she hated, chaste in work and will;
Her neck and breasts were ever open bare,
That aye thereof her babes might suck their fill;
The rest was all in yellow robes arraied still.
A multitude of babes about her hang,
Plying their sports, that joy'd her to behold,
Whom still she fed, whilst they were weak and young,
But thrust them forth still, as they waxed old:
And on her head she wore a tire of gold,
Adorn'd with gemmes and owches wondrous fair,
Whose passing price uneath was to be told;
And by her side there sate a gentle pair
Of turtle doves, she sitting in an ivory chaire.

BUT lovely concord, and most sacred peace,
Doth nourish virtue, and fast friendship breeds;
Weake she makes strong, and strong things does increase,
Till it the pitch of highest praise exceeds.
Brave be her warres, as honourable deedes,
By which she triumphs over ire and pride,
And winnes an olive girlond for her meeds.

§ 37. Contemplation.

THERE they doe find that godly aged sire,
With snowy locks adown his shoulders shed,
As hoarie frost with spangles doth attire
The mossy branches of an oak half dead.
Each bone might through his body well be read,
And every sinew seen through his long fast:
For nought he car'd, his carcase long unfed;
His mind was full of spiritual repast,
And pyn'd his flesh to keep his body lowe and chaste.

§ 38. Cupid.

LIKE a Cupido on Idæan hill,
When having laid his cruel bowe away,
And mortal arrows, wherewith he doth fill
The world with wondrous spoils and bloodie prey:
With his faire mother he him dights to play,
And with his goodly sisters, graces three;
The goddesse pleased with his wanton play,
Suffers herself through sleep beguil'd to be,
The whiles the other ladies mind their merry glee.
First, she him sought in court where most he used
Whylome to haunt, but there she found him not;
But many there she found, which sore accused
His falsehood, and with foule infamous blot,
His cruel deeds and wicked wiles did spot:

Ladies and lords she every-where mote hear
Complaining, how with his empoysned shot
Their woful hearts he wounded had whyleare, [and feare.
And so had left them languishing 'twixt hope

She then the cities sought from gate to gate,
And ev'ry one did ask, did he him see;

And every one her answer'd, and too late
He had him seen, and felt the crueltie
Of his sharp darts, and hot artillerie;

And every one threw forth reproaches rife
Of his mischievous deeds, and said, that hee
Was the disturber of all civil life,
The enemy of peace, and author of all strife.

Then in the country she abroad him sought,
And in the rural cottages enquired:

Where also many plaints to her were brought,
How he their heedless hearts with love had fired,

And false venom thorough their veines inspired;
And eke the gentle shepherd swaines, which
sate

Keeping their fleecy flocks, as they were hired,
She sweetly heard complaine, both how and what

Her sonne had to them doen; yet she did smile thereat.

And at the upper end of the faire towne,
There was an altar built of precious stone,
Of passing value, and of great renowne,
On which there stood an image all alone,
Of massie gold, which with his own light shone;

And wings it had with sundry colours dight,
More sundry colours than the proud pavone
Bears in his boasted fan, or Iris bright,
When her discolour'd bow she spreads through heaven bright.

Blindfold he was, and in his cruel fist
A mortal bow and arrowes keen did hold,

With which he shot at random when he list:
Some headed with sad lead, some with pure gold [hold).

(Ah, man! beware how thou those darts be-
A wounded dragon under him did lie,
Whose hideous tayle his left foot did enfold,
And with a shaft was shot through eyther eye, [remedy.

That no man forth could draw, ne no man

Next after her, the winged god himself
Came riding on a lyon ravenous,

Taught to obey the menage of that elfe,
That man and beast with powre imperious
Subdueth to his kingdom tyrannous:

His blindfold eyes he had awhile unbind,
That his proud spoyle of that same dolorous
Fair dame he might behold in perfect kind;
Which seen he much rejoyceth in his cruel
mind.

Of which full proud, himself up-rearing hye,
He looked round about with stern disdaine;

And did survey his goodly company;
And marshalling the evil ordered traine,
With that the darts which his right hand did
straine,

Full dreadfully he shook, that all did quake,
And clapt on high his coloured wings twaine,
That all his many it affraide did make:
Though binding him againe, his way he forth did take.

§ 39. Danger.

WITH him went Danger, cloth'd in ragged
weed,

Made of a beares skyn, that him more dreadful made:

Yet his own face was dreadful, ne did need
Strange horror, to deform his griesly shade;
A net in th' one hand, and a rusty blade

In th' other was: this mischiefe, that mishap;
With th' one his foes he threatened to invade,

With th' other he his friends meant to en-wrap: [entrap.

For, whom he could not kill, he practis'd to

Another.

BUT in the porch did ever more abide
An hideous giant, dredful to behold,

That stopt the entrance with his spacious stride;

And with the terror of his countenance bold,
Full many did affray, that else faine enter would.

His name was Danger, dreaded over all,
Who day and night did watch and duly ward,
From fearful cowards entrance to forestall,
And faint-heart fooles, whom show of perill hard

Could terrifie from Fortune's faire award:

For, oftentimes, faint hearts at first espiall
Of his grim face, were from approaching scar'd;

Unworthy they of grace, whom one deniall
Excludes from faire hope, withouten further triall.

Yet many doughty heroes, often tride
In greater perils to be stout and bold,

Durst not the sternness of his look abide;
But soon as they his countenance behold,
Began to faint, and feel their courage cold.

Again, some other, that in hard assaies
Were cowards known, and little count did hold,
Either through gifts, or guile, or such like waies, Crept in by stooping lowe, or stealing of the

BY this, the northern waggoner had set
His sevenfold teme behind the stedfast star,

That was in ocean waves yet never wet.
But firme is fixt, and sendeth light from far
To all, that in the wide deep wandering are:

And chearful Chaunticlere with his notes shrill
Had warned once, that Phœbus' fiery carre

In haste was climbing up the eastern hill;
Full envious that night so long his room did fill.

§ 41. Death.

AND in his hand a bended bow was scene,
And many arrowes under his right side,

All deadly dangerous, all cruel keene,
Headed with flint, and feathers bloudie de.

Such as the Indians in their quivers hide :
Those could he well direct, and strait as line,
And bid them strike the marke which he had eyde ;

Ne was there salve, ne was there medicine,
That mote recure their wounds ; so inly they did tine.

As pale and wan as ashes was his look,
His body lean and meagre as a rake,
And skin all wither'd as a dried rook,
Thereto as cold and drery as a snake,
That seem'd to tremble evermore, and quake ;
All in a canvas thin he was bedight,
And girded with a belt of twisted brake,
Upon his head he wore an helmet light,
Made of a dead man's skull, that seem'd a gastly sight.

§ 42. Defamation.

HIM in a narrow place he overtook,
And fierce assailing forc't him turn againe ;
Sternly he turn'd again, when he him strooke
With his sharp steele, and ran at him amaine
With open mouth, that seemed to containe
A full good peck within the utmost brim,
All set with iron teeth with ranges twaine,
That terrified his foes, and armed him,
Appearing like the mouth of Orcus, grisly grim.

And therein were a thousand tongues empight,
Of sundry kindes, and sundry quality ;
Some were of dogs, that barked day and
night,
And some of cats, that wralling still did cry ;
And some of bears, that groynd continually ;
And some of tigers that did seem to gren
And snar at all that ever passed by :

But most of them were tongues of mortal men,
That spake reproachfully, not caring where nor when.

And then amongst were mingled here and
there,
The tongues of serpents, with three forked stings,
That spat out poison, and bore bloody gere
At all that came within his ravenings,
And spake licentious words, and hateful things,
Of good and bad alike, of low and hie ;
Ne Cæsars spared he a whit, nor kings,
But either blotted them with infamy,
Or bit them with his baneful teeth of injury.

§ 43. Desire.

AND him beside marcht amorous Desire,
Who seem'd of riper years than th' other swaine ;
Yet was that other swaine the elder syre,
And gave him being, common to them twaine :
His garment was disguised very vaine,
And his embroidered bonet sate awry ;
'Twixt both his hands flew sparks he close did strain,
Which still he blew, and kindled busily,

That soon they life conceiv'd, and forth in flames did fly.

§ 44. Detraction.

THE other nothing better was than she ;
Agreeing in bad will and cancred kind,
But in bad manner they did disagree ;
For, what-so Envie good or bad did find,
She did conceale and murder her own mind ;
But this, whatever evil she conceived,
Did spread abroad, and throw in the open wind.

Yet this in all her words might be perceived,
That all she sought was men's good names to have bereaved.

For whatsoever good by any said,
Or done, she heard, she would strait-waies invent

How to deprave, or slanderously upbraid,
Or to misconstrue of a man's intent,
And turne to ill the thing that well was ment.
Therefore she used often to resort
To common haunts, and company's frequent,
To hark what any one did good report,
To blot the same with blame, or wrest in wicked sort.

And if that any ill she heard of any,
She would it eke, and make it worse by telling,
And take great joy to publish it to many,
That every matter worse was for her melling :
Her name was hight Detraction, and her dwelling

Was near to Envy, even her neighbour next ;
A wicked hag, and Envy's self excelling
In mischief : for, herself she only vext :
But this same, both herself and others eke perplex.

Her face was ugly, and her mouth distort,
Foaming with poyson round about her gills,
In which her cursed tongue (full sharp and short)

Appear'd like aspis sting, that closely kills,
Or cruelly does wound whom-so she wills ;
A distaff in her other hand she had,
Upon the which she little spinnes, but spils,
And faines to weave false tales and leasings bad,
To throw among the good, when others had disprad.

§ 45. Discord.

FIREBRAND of hell, first tin'd in Phlegeton,
By thousand furies, and from thence outthrown,
Into this world, to work confusion,
And sett it all on fire (by force unknown)
Is wicked Discord, whose small sparkles once blowne,

None but a god, or godlike man, can slake :
Such as was Orpheus, that when strife was grown Amongst those famous impes of Greece, did take
His silver harp in hand, and shortly friends them make.

§ 46. Discord's House.

HARD by the gates of hell her dwelling is,
There whereas all plagues and harmes abound,
Which punish wicked men, that walk amiss;
It is a darksome delve farre under ground,
With thornes and barren brakes environd round.

That none the same way may out-win;
Yet many wayes to enter may be found,
But none to issue forth when one is in;
For discord harder is to end than to begin.

And all within the riven walles were hung
With ragged monuments of times fore-past,
Of which, the sad effects of discord sung;
There were rent robes, and broken scepters
Altars defil'd, and holy things defac't, [plac't, Dishevered spears, and shields ytorne in twaine.

Great cittys ransack't, and strong castles ras't,
Nations captived, and huge armies slaine:
Of all which ruines there some reliques did remaine.

There was the signe of antique Babylon,
Of fatal Thebes, of Rome that raign'd long,
Of sacred Salem, and sad Ilion,
For memory of which, on high there hong
The golden apple (cause of all their wrong)
For which the three faire goddesses did strive:

There also was the name of Nimrod strong,
Of Alexander, and his princes five,
Which shar'd to them the spoiles which he had got alive.

And there the reliques of the drunken fray,
The which amongst the Lapithees befell,
And of the bloody feast, which sent away
So many Centaures' drunken soules to hell,
That under great Alcides' furie fell:

And of the dreadful discord, which did drive
The noble Argonauts to outrage fell,
That each of life sought other to deprive,
All mindless of the golden-fleece which made them strive.

And eke of private persons many moe,
That were too long a worke to count them all;
Some of sworne friends, that did their faith
forgoe;

Some of borne brethren, prov'd unnatural;
Some of deare lovers, foes perpetual;

Witness their broken bands there to be seen,
Their girlonds rent, their bowres dispoiled all;
The monuments whereof there byding been,
As plaine as at the first, when they were fresh and green.

Such was the house within; but all without
The barren ground was full of wicked weeds,
Which she herself had sown all about,
Now growen great, at first of little seedes,
The seedes of evil words, and factious deedes;
Which when to ripeness due they growen
are,

Bring forth an infinite increase, that breeds
Tumultuous trouble, and contentious jarre,
The which most often end in blood-shed and in warre.

And those same cursed seedes do also serve
To her for bread, and yield a living food:
For life it is to her, when others sterve
Thro' mischievous debate, and deadly feood,
That she may suck their life, and drink their blood, [fed,

With which she from her childhood had been
For she at first was born of hellish brood,
And by infernal furies nourished, [read.
That by her monstrous shape might easily be

Her face most foule and filthy was to see,
With squinting eyes contrary ways entended,
And loathly mouth, unmeet a mouth to be;
That nought but gall and venim comprehended,
And wicked words that God and man offended:
Her lying tongue was in two parts divided,
And both the parts did speak, and both contended,

And as her tongue, so was her heart decided,
That never thought one thing, but doubly still was guided.

Als as she double spake, so heard she double,
With matchless ears deformed and distort,
Fil'd with false rumors, and seditious trouble,
Bred in assemblies of the vulgar sort,
That still are led with every light report.

And as her eares, so eke her feet were odde,
And much unlike, th' one long, the other short,
And both misplac't; that when th' one forward gode,

The other back retired, and contrary trode.

Likewise unequal were her handes twaine;
That one did reach, the other pusht away;
The one did make, the other marr'd againe,
And sought to bring all things unto decay;
Whereby great riches, gather'd many a day,
She in short space did often bring to nought,
And their possessours often did dismay.

For all her study was, and all her thought,
How she might overthrowe the thing that concord wrought.

So much her malice did her might surpass,
That even th' Almighty selfe she did maligne
Because to man so merciful he was,
And unto all his creatures so benigne,
Sith she her self was of his grace indigne:

For all this world's faire workmanship she
Unto his last confusion to bring, [tride

And that great golden chain quite to divide,
With which it blessed concord hath together tide.

As when a dolphin and a sele are met,
In the wide champion of the ocean plaine,
With cruel chaufe their courages they whet,
The masterdome of each by force to gaine,
And dreadful battaile 'twixt them to darraine:
They snuff, they snort, they bounce, they rage, they rore,

That all the sea (disturbed with their traine)
Doth frie with some above the surges bore,
Such was betwixt these two the troublesome uprore.

§ 48. Doubt.

NEXT after him went Doubt, yclad
In a discolour'd cote of strange disguise,
That at his back a brode cappacio had,
And sleeves dependant Albanese wise:
He lookt askew with his mistrustful eyes,
And nicely trode, as thorns lay in his way,
Or that the flore to shrink he did advise,
And on a broken reed he still did stay
His feeble steps, which shrunke, when hard thereon he lay.

Another.

THAT was to weet, the porter of the place,
Unto whose trust the charge thereof was lent:
His name was Doubt, he had a double face,
Th' one forward looking, and the other backward bent;
There in resembling Janus auncient,
Which hath in charge the ingate of the yeare:
And evermore his eyes about him went,
As if some proved perill he did feare,
Or did misdoubt some ill, whose cause did not appeare.

§ 49. Dungeon.

DEEP in the bottom of an huge great rocke
The dungeon was, in which her bound he left,
That neither yron barrs, nor brazen lock
Did need to guard from force, or secret theft
Of all her lovers, which would have her rest.
For wall'd it was with waves, which rag'd and roar'd
As they the clift in pieces would have cleft:
Besides, ten thousand monsters, foule ab-hor'd,
Did waite about it, gaping griesly, all begor'd.

§ 50. Eagle.

LIKE to an eagle in his kingly pride
Soaring through his wide empire,
To weather his broad sayles; by chance hath spide
A goshaulk, which hath seized for her share
Upon some fowle, that should her feast prepare:
With dreadful force he flies at her belive,
That with his souce, which none endure dare,
Her from the quarrey he away doth drive,
And from her griping pounce the greedy prey doth rive.

Another.

As when Jove's harness-bearing bird from high,
Stoupes at a flying heron with proud disdain,
The stone-dead quarrey fals so forcibly,
That it rebounds against the lowlie plaine,
A second fall redoubling back againe.

PROCEEDING to the midst he still did stand,
As if in minde he somewhat had to say;
And to the vulgar beck'ning with his hand
In signe of silence, as to hear a play,

By lively actions he began bewray
Some argument of matter passioned;
Which doen, he back retired soft away:
And passing by, his name discovered,
Ease on his robe in golden letters ciphered.

§ 52. Envy.

AND next to him malicious Envie rode,
Upon a ravenous wolfe, and still did chaw
Between his cankred teeth a venemous toad,
That all the poyson ran about his jaw;
But inwardly he chewed his own maw [sad,
At neighbours wealth, that made him ever
For death it was, when any good he saw,
And wept, that cause of weeping none he had: [drous glad.
But when he heard of harme, he wexed won-
All in a kirtle of discolour'd say
He clothed was, ypainted full of eyes;
And in his bosom secretly there lay
An hateful snake, the which his tail up ties
In many folds, and mortal sting implies.
Still as he rode, he gnasht his teeth, to see
Those heaps of gold with griple covetise,
And grudged at the great felicity
Of proud Lucifera, and his own company.

He hated all good works and virtuous deeds,
And him no less, that any like did use;
And who with gracious bread the hungry
feeds,
His alms for want of faith he doth accuse:
So every good to bad he doth abuse;
And eke the verse of famous poet's wit
He doth back-bite, and spiteful poison spues
From leprous mouth, on all that ever writ:
Such on vile Envy was, that first in rowe did sit.

Another.

THE one of them, that elder did appear,
With her dull eyes, did seem to look askew,
That her mis-shape much helpt; and her foul haire
Hung loose and loathsomely: thereto her hew
Was wan and leane, that all her teeth arew,
And all her bones might thro' her cheeks be read;
Her lips were like raw leather, pale and blue:
And as she spake, therewith she slaver'd;
Yct spake she seldome, but thought more the less she said.

Her hands were foule and dirty, never washt
In all her life, with long nailes over-raught, Like puttocks claws, with the one of which she scratcht
Her cursed head, although it itched nought;
The other held a snake with venime fraught,
On which she fed and gnawed hungerly,
As that long she had not eaten ought;
That round about her jawes one might descry
The bloody gore and poison dropping lothsomerly.

Her name was Envie, knowen well thereby;
Whoes nature is to grieve, and grudge at all
That ever she sees doen praise worthily:
Whoes sight to her is greatest cross may fall,

And vexeth so, that makes her eat her gall.

For when she wanteth other things to eat,
She feeds on her own maw unnatural,
And of her own foule entrailes makes her meat;
Meat fit for such a monster's monstrous diat.

And if she hapt of any good to hear,
That had to any body happily betid, [teare
Then would she inly fret, and grieve, and
Her flesh for felness, which she inward hid:
But if she heard of ill that any did,

Or harm that any had, then would she make
Great cheare, like one unto a banquet bid;

And in another's loss great pleasure take,
As she had got thereby, and gained a great

THIS is a wandring wood, this Error's den;
A monster vile, whom God and man does hate.

By which he saw the ugly monster plaine,
Half like a serpent horribly displaide.

But th' other half did woman's shape retaine,
Most lothsome, filthy, foul, and full of vile disdaine.

As she lay upon the dirtie grownd,
Her huge long taile her den all over-spread,
Yet was in knots and many boughs up-
wound,

Pointed with mortal sting. Of her there bred
A thousand young ones, and she daily fed,

Sucking upon her poisonous dugs, each one
Of sundry shape, yet all ill-favoured:

Soon as that uncouth light upon them shone,
Into her mouth they crept, and suddain all were gone.

BUT young Perissa was of other mind,
Full of disport, still laughing, loosely light,

And quite contrary to her sister's kind;
No measure in her mood, no rule of right,
But poured out in pleasure and delight;

In wine and meats she flow'd above the bank,

And in excess exceeded her own might;

In sumptuous tire she joy'd herself to prank;

But of her love to lavish, little have she thank.

Another.

UNDER that porch a comely dame did rest,
Clad in faire weedes, but foule disordered,
And garments loose, that seem'd unmeet for womanhood.

In her left hand a cup of gold she held,
And with her right the riper fruit did reach,
Whoes sappy liquor with that fullness
swell'd,

Into her cup she screws, with dainty breach
Of her fine fingers, without foule impeach,

That so faire wine-press made the wine more
sweet;

Thereof she us'd to give to drink to each,
Whome passing by she happened to meet:

It was her guise, all strangers goodly so to greet.

OF which the eldest, that Fidelia hight,
Like sunny beames threw from her crystal face,
That could have daz'd the rash beholder's sight, [light.

And round her head did shine like heaven's

She was arraid all in lily white,
And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,

With wine and water fill'd up to the height,
In which a serpent did himself enfold,

That horror made to all that did behold;

But she no whit did change her constant mood;

And in her other hand she fast did hold

A book that was both sign'd and seal'd with blood,

Wherein dark things were writ, hard to be understood.

§ 56. Falcon.

As a falcon faire
That once has failed of her souse full neare,
Remounts again into the open aire,
And unto better fortune doth herself prepare.

Another.

As when a falcon hath with nimble flight
Flown at a flush of ducks, foreby he broke,
The trembling brood dismaid with dreadful sight

Of death, the which them almost overtook,
Doe hide themselves from her astonying look,
Amongst the flags and coverts round about.

Another.

As when a cast of falcons make their flight
At an hernessaw, that lyes aloft on wing,
The whiles they strike at him with heedless
might,

The warie fowl his bill doth backward wring;
On which she first, whoes force her first doth
bring,

Herself quite through the body doth engore,
And falleth down to ground like senseless thing
But the other not so swift as she before,
Fails of her souse, and passing by doth hurt
no more.

§ 57. Fancy.

EMONGST them all sate he which wonned
there,

That hight Phantastes by his nature trew;

A man in yeares, yet fresh as mote appeare,
Of swarth complexion, and of crabbed hue,
That him full of melancholy did shew; [eyes

Bent hollow beetle browes, sharp stairing
That mad or foolish seem'd: one by his view
Mote deem him borne with ill-disposed skyes,

When oblique Saturne sate in the house of agonies.

Another.

THE first was Fancy, like a lovely boy,
Of rare aspect, and beauty without peare;
Matchable eyther to that impe of Troy,
Whom Jove did love, and chose his cup to beare,

Or the same daintie lad that was so deare
To great Alcides, that when as he did hide,
He wailed woman-like with many a teare,
And every wood and every valley wide
He fill'd with Hylas' name, the nymphes eke Hylas cride.

His garment neither was of silk nor say,
But painted plumes in goodly order dight,
Like as the sun-burnt Indians do array
Their tawny bodies in their proudest plight:
As those same plumes, so seem'd he vain and
light,
That by his gate might easily appeare:
For still he far'd as dancing in delight,
And in his hand a windy fan did beare,
That in the idle aire he mov'd still here and there.

§ 58. Fear.

NEXT him was Feare, all arm'd from top to toe,
Yet thought himself not safe enough thereby,
But fear'd each shadow moving to and fro;
And his own armes when glitt'ring he did spy,
Or clashing heard, he fast away did fly,
As ashes pale of hue, and wingy-heel'd;
And evermore on danger fixt his eye,
'Gainst whom he always bent a brazen shield,
Which his right hand unarmed fearfully did wield.

§ 59. Ship.

As when a ship that flies fair under saile,
And hidden rock escap'd hath unawares,
That lay in wait her wrack to bewaile,
The mariner yet half amazed stares
At peril past, and yet it doubt ne dares
To joy at his fool-happy over-sight.

Another.

As a tall ship tossed in troublous seas,
Whome raging winds, thereating to make the prey
Of the rough rocks, do diversly disease,
Meets two contrary billows by the way,
That her on either side do sore assay,
And boast to swallow her in greedy grave;
She, scorning both their spights, does make wide way,
And with her breast breaking the foamy wave,
Does ride on both their backs, and faire herself

BUT the fift troupe most horrible of hue,
And fierce of force, was dreadful to reporte:
For some like snails, some did like spiders
shew,
And some like ugly urchins, thick and short;
They cruelly assailed that fift fort,
Armed with darts of sensuall delight,
With stings of carnall lust, and strong effort
Of feeling pleasure, with which day and
night
Against that same fift bulwark they continued fight.

§ 61. Fire.

LIKE as a fire, the which in hollow cave
Hath long been under kept and down sup-
prest,
With murmurous disdain doth inly rave,
And grudge in so streight prison to be prest,
At last breakes forth with furious unrest,
And strives to mount unto his native seat;
All that earst it hinder and molest,
It now devours with flames and scorching
heat,
And carries into smoake with rage and horror great.

§ 62. First Age.

THE antique world, in his first flowing youth,
Found no defect in his Creator's grace;
But with glad thanks, and unreprieved truth,
The gifts of soveraigne bounty did embrace:
Like angel's life was then man's happy case;
But later ages pride (like corn-fed steede)
Abus'd her plenty, and fat-swoln encrease,
To all licentious lust, and gan exceed
The measure of her meane, and natural first need.

Then gan a cursed hand the quiet wombe
Of his great grandmother with steele to wound,
And the hid treasures in her sacred tombe
With sacrilege to dig. Therein he found
Fountaines of gold and silver to abound,
Of which the matter of his huge desire
And pompous pride eftsoones he did compound,
Then avarice gan through his veines to inspire
His greedy flames, and kendle life-devouring
fire.

§ 63. Flood.

As he that strives to stop a sudden flood,
And in strong bankes his violence enclose,
Forceth his swell above his wonted mood,
And largely overflowe the fruitful plaine,
That all the country seems to be a maine,
And the rich furrowes flote, all quite for-donne,
The woful husbandman doth loud complaine
To see his whole yeare's labour lost so soon,
For which to God he made so many an idle boon.

§ 64. Fury.

BUT Fury was full ill apparelled
In rags, that naked nigh she did appeare,
With ghastrull looks and dreadfull drery
head,
For from her back her garments she did teare,
And from her head oft rent her snarled haire:
In her right-hand a fire-brand she did tosse
About her head, still roaming here and there;
As a dismayed deere in chase embost,
Forgetful of his safety hath his right way lost.

§ 65. Giant.

His monstrous enemy.
With sturdy steps came stalking in his sight,
An hideous giant horrible and lie,

That with his tallness seem'd to threat the sky;
The ground eke groned under him for dreed;
His living like saw never living eye,
Ne durst behold; his stature did exceed
The height of three the tallest sons of mortal seed.

§ 66. Gluttony.

AND by his side rode loathsome Gluttony,
Deformed creature, on a filthy swine,
His belly was up-blown with luxury,
And eke with fatness swollen were his eyene:
And like a crane his neck was long and fine,
With which he swallowed up excessive
feast,
For want whereof poor people oft did pine;
And all the way, most like a brutish beast,
He spewed up his gorge, that all did him deteast.

In green vine leaves he was right fitly clad,
For other clothes he could not wear for heat,
And on his head an ivy girlond had,
From under which fast trickled down the sweat:
Still as he rode he somewhat did eat,
And in his hand did bear a bouzing cann,
On which he supt so oft, that on his seat
His drunken corse he scarce upholden can,
In shape and life more like a monster than a man.

Unfit he was for any worldly thing,
And eke unable once to stirre or go;
Not meet to be a counsellor to a king, [so:
Whose minde in meat and drink was drowned
Full of disease was his carcase blue,
And a dry dropsy through his flesh did flow,
Which by misdiet daily greater grew:
Such one was Gluttony, the second of that crew.

§ 67. Greediness.

THAT is the Gulfe of Greediness, they say,
That deep engorgeth all this world's prey:
Which having swallow'd up excessively,
He soon in vomit up again doth lay,
And belcheth forth his superfluite,
That all the seas for fear doe seem away to fly.

§ 68. Grief.

NEXT him went Grief and Fury matcht
yfer;
Griefe, all in sable sorrow fully clad,
Down-hanging his dull head with heavy
Yet inly being more than seemly sad: [cheere,
A pair of pincers in his hand he had,
With which he pinced people to the heart,
That from thenceforth a wretched life they had,
In wilful languor and consuming smart,
Dying each day with inward wounds of dolour's dart.

§ 69. Griffon.

As when a Griffon seized on his prey,
A dragon fierce encountereth in his flight:
Through wildest ayre making his idle way,

That would his rightful ravine rend away;
With hideous horreur, both together smight,
And souce so sore, that they the heavens affray.

The wise southsayer seeing so sad a sight,
The amazed vulgar tells of warres and mortal
fight.

INTO that forest farre they thence him led,
Where was their dwelling in a pleasant glade
With mountains round about environed,
And mighty woods, which did the valley shade,
And like a stately theatre it made,
Spreading itself into a spacious plaine,
And in the midst a little river plaid [plaine Emongst the pumystones, which seem'd to
With gentle murmur that his course they did restraine.

Enforc't to seek some covert nigh at hand,
A shady grove not farre away they spide,
That promis't ayde the tempest to withstand:

Whoes lofty trees yclad with summer's pride,
Did spread so broad that heaven's light did
hide,

Not perceable with power of any starre:
And all within were paths and alleies wide,
With footing worne, and leading inward farre: [entred are.

Faire harbour, that them seemes; so in they § 71. Harmony.

EFTSOONES they heard a most melodious
sound,

Of all that mote delight a dainty eare,
Such as at once might not on living ground,
Save in this paradise, be heard elsewhere:

Right hard was it for wight that did it heare,
To read what manner musick that mote be:
For all that pleasing is to living eare,
Was there consorted in one harmonie,
Birds, voices, instruments, windes, waters,— all agree.

The joyous birds shrouded in chearful shade,
Their notes unto the voyce attempted sweet;

The angel call soft trembling voyces made
To the instruments divine response meet:
The silver sounding instruments did meet

With the base murmure of the waters fall:
The waters fall, with difference discreet,

Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call,
The gently warbling wind lowe answering to all.

§ 72. Hearing.

THE second bulwarke was the hearing sense,
'Gainst which the second troupe assignment makes;

Deformed creatures, in strange difference,
Some having heads like harts; some like to snakes,
Some like wild bores late rous'd out of the breakes,

Slandrous reproches, and foule infamies,
Leasings, backbitings, and vain glorious crakes,
Bad counsels, prayses, and false flatteries,
All those against that fort did build their batteries.

§ 73. Hermitage.

A LITTLE lowly hermitage it was,
Down in a dale hard by a forest side,
Farre from resort of people that did pass
In travell to and fro: a little wide
There was an holy chapell edified,
Wherein the hermit duly went to say
His holy things each morn and evening tide:
Thereby a crystal streame did gently play,
Which from a sacred fountain welled forth
away.

He thence led me into this hermitage,
Letting his steeds to graze upon the green;
Small was his house, and like a little cage,
For his own turne, yet inly neat and clean,
Deckt with green boughes, and flowers gay be seene;
Therein he them full faire did entertaine,
Not with such forged showes, as fitter beene
For courting fools that courtesies would faine,
But with entire affection, and appearance
plaine.

§ 74. Hippolytus.

HIPPOLYTUS a jolly huntsman was,
That went in charot chase the foaming boar,
He all his peers in beauty did surpass,
But lady's love, as loss of time, forebore:
His wanton step-dame loved him the more.
But when she saw her offer'd sweet refus'd,
Her love she turn'd to hate, and him before
His father fierce, of treason false accus'd,
And with her jealous terms his open ears
abus'd.

Who all in rage his sea-god sire besought
Some cursed vengeance on his son to cast;
From surging gulph two monsters straight were brought,
With dread whereof his chasing steeds aghast
Both charot swift and huntsman overcast;
His goodly corps on ragged cliffs yrent
Was quite dismembred, and his members chast
Scattred on every mountaine, as he went,
That of Hippolytus was left no monument.

Whoso in pompe of proud estate (quoth she)
Does swim, and bathes himself in courtly bliss,
Does wast his daies in darke obscurity
And in oblivion ever buried is;
Where ease abounds, it's easie to doe amiss;
But who his limbs with labours, and his
mind
Behaves with cares, cannot so easie miss.

Abroad in arms, at home in studious kind,
Who seekes with painefull toile, shall honour
soonest find.

In woods, in waves, in wars she wonts to
dwell,
And will be found with perill and with paine;
Ne can the man that moulds in idle cell,
Unto her happy mansion attain:
Before her gate high God did sweat ordaine,
And wakeful watches ever to abide;
But easie is the way, and passage plaine
To pleasure's palace; it may soon be spide,
And day and night her doors to all stand open wide.

§ 76. Hope.

With him went Hope in rank, a handsome mayd,
Of chearful look, and lovely to behold;
In silken samile she was light arraid,
And her faire locks were woven up in gold;
She always smil'd, and in her hand did hold
An holy water sprinkle dipt in deawe,
In which she sprinkled favours manyfold,
On whom she list, and did great liking
shewe;
Great liking unto many, but true love to fewe.

Another.

HER youngest sister, that Speranza hight,
Was clad in blue, that her beseemed well,
Not all so chearful seemed she of sight,
As was her sister; whether dread did dwell,
Or anguish in her heart, is hard to tell:
Upon her arme a silver anchor lay,
Whereon she leaned ever, as befell:
And ever up to Heaven as she did pray,
Her stedfast eyes were bent, ne swarved other
way.

§ 77. Hydra.

OR like the hell-born Hydra, which they
faine,
That great Alcides whylome overthrew,
After that he had labour'd long in vaine,
To crop his thousand heads, the which still new
Forth budded, and in great numbers grew.

Another.

SUCH own it was, as that renowned snake
Which great Alcides in Stremona slew,
Long foster'd in the filth of Lerna lake,
Whose many heads out-budding ever new,
Did breed him endless labour to subdue.

AT length they chanc't to meet upon the
way
An aged sire, in long black weeds yclad,
His feet all bare, his beard all hoary graie,

And by his belt his book he hanging had;
 Sober he seem'd, and very sagely sad,
 And to the ground his eyes were lowly bent,
 Simple in shewe, and void of malice bad,
 And all the way he prayed as he went,
 And often knockt his breast, as one that did repent.

§ 79. Idleness.

OF which the first, that all the rest did guide,
 Was sluggish Idleness, the nurse of sin;
 Upon a slothful ass he chose to ride,
 Arraid in habit black, and amis thin,
 Like to an holy monk the servis to begin.

And in his hand a portesse still he bare,
 That much was worne, but therein little red;
 For of devotion he had little care.
 Still drown'd in sleep, and most of his days
 dead,
 Scarce could he once uphold his heavy head
 To looken whether it were night or day.
 May seem the waine was very evil led,
 When such an one had guiding of the way,
 That knew not whether right he went, or else astray.

From worldly cares himself he did esloine,
 And greatly shunned manly exercise
 For every work he challenged effoine,
 For contemplation sake: yet otherwise,
 His life he led in lawless riotise:

By which he grew to grievous maladie;
 For in his lustless limbs through evil guise
 A shaking feaver raign'd continually:
 Such one was Idleness, first of this company.

§ 80. Ignorance.

AT last, with creeping crooked pace, forth came
 An old man, with beard as white as snow,
 That on a staffe his feeble steps did frame,
 And guide his weary steps both to and fro;
 For his eye-sight him fail'd long ago;
 And on his arme a bunch of keys he bore,
 The which, unus'd, rust did overgrowse:
 Those were the keys of every inward dore;
 But he could not them use, but kept them still in store.

But very uncouth sight was to behold
 How he did fashion his untoward pace:
 For as he forward mov'd his footing old,
 So backward still was turn'd his wrinkled face;
 Unlike to men, who ever as they trace,
 Both feet and face one way are wont to lead;
 This was the ancient keeper of that place,
 And foster father of the giant dead,
 His name Ignaro did his nature right aread.

§ 81. Inconstancy.

FOR those same islands, seeing now and then,
 Are not firme land, or any certein wonne,
 But straggling plots: which to and fro do ronne
 In the wide waters: therefore are they hight

The Wandring Islands: therefore do them
 shonne; [wight
 For they have oft drawn many a wandring
 Into most deadly danger and distressed plight.

Yet well they seem to him, that farre doth
 view,
 Both faire and fruitful, and the ground dispred
 With grassie green of delectable hew,
 And the tall trees with leaves unparalled,
 Are deckt with blossoms dyed in white and red,
 That mote the passengers there to allure:
 But whosoever once hath fastened
 His foot thereon, may never yet recure,
 But wandreth evermore uncertain and unsure.

THE wanton lady with her lover rose,
 Whoes sleepy head she in her lap did soft dispose.
 Upon a bed of roses she was laid,
 As faint through heat, or dight to pleasant sin,
 And was arraid, or rather disarraid,
 All in a veil of silk and silver thin,
 That hid no whit her alabaster skin, [be:
 But rather showed more white, if more might
 More subtile web Arachne cannot spin,
 Nor the fine nets which oft we woven see
 Of scorched dew, do not in th' air more lightly flee.

AND next to him rode lustfull Lechery,
 Upon a bearded goat, whoes rugged haire,
 And whaley eyes (the signe of jealousy)
 Was like the person self whom he did beare;
 Who rough and black, and filthy did appeare,
 Unseemly man to please fair lady's eye;
 Yet he of ladys oft was loved dear,
 When fairer faces were bid standen by:
 O! who does know the bent of woman's fan-tasie?

In a green gowne he clothed was full faire,
 Which underneath did hide his filthiness,
 And in his hand a burning heart did bare,
 Full of vaine follies, and new fangleness,
 For he was false, and fraught with fickleness,
 And learned had to love with secret looks,
 And well could dance and sing with rueful-ness,
 And fortunes tell, and read in loveing books,
 And thousand other waies, to bait his fleshly hooks.

Inconstant man, that loved all he saw,
 And lusted after all that he did love,
 Ne would his looser life be tied to law,
 But joy'd weak women's hearts to tempt and prove,
 If from their loyal loves he might them move;
 Which lewdness fill'd him with reproachful
 paine
 Of that foul evill which all men reprove:
 That rots the marrow and consumes the braine:
 Such one was Lechery, the third of all this traine.

§ 84. Life.

O WHY doe wretched men so much desire
To draw their days unto the utmost date,
And doe not rather wish them soon expire,
Knowing the misery of their estate,
And thousand perils which them still awaite, Tossing themselves like a boat amid the maine

That every hour they knock at deathes gate?
And he that happy seemes, and least in
paine,
Yet is as nigh his end, as he that most doth
plaine.

The whiles some one did chaunt this lovely lay;

Ah see, who so faire thing dost faine to see,
In springing flowre the image of thy day;
All see thy virgin rose, how sweetly shee
Doth first peep forth with bashful modestie,
Thus fairer seems, the less you see her may;
Lo, see soon after, how more bold and free
Her bared bosom she doth broad display;
Lo, see soon after, how she fades and falls
away.

So passeth in the passing of a day,
Of mortal life the lease, the bud, the flowre,
Ne more doth flourish after first decay,
That earst was sought to deck both bed and bowre
Of many a lady, and many a paramoure:
Gather the rose of love, whilst yet is time,
Whilst loving thou mayst loved be with equal crime.

§ 85. Lion.

LIKE as a lion that by chaunce doth fall
Into the hunter's toil, doth rage and roare,
In royal heart disdainning to be thrall:
But all in vaine; for what might one do more?
They have him taken captive, though it grieve him sore.

Another.

Like as a lion, whoes imperial powre
A proud rebellious unicorn defies,
To avoid the rash assault and wrathful stowre
Of his fierce foe, him to a tree applies,
And when him running in full course he spies,
He slips aside; the whiles that furious beast
His precious horne sought of his enemies,
Strikes in the stock, ne thence can be releast,
But to the mighty victor yields a bounteous
feast.

§ 86. Love.

O SACRED fire that burnest mightily
In living breasts, ykindled first above,
Emongst th' eternal spheres and lamping
sky,
And thence pour'd into men, which men call
love;
Not that same which doth base affections
move
In brutish mindes, and filthy lust inflame;
But that sweet fit, that does true beauty love,
And choseth vertue for his dearest dame,
Whence spring all noble deeds, and never-dying fame.

Well did antiquitie a god thee deeme,
That over mortal minds has so great might,
To order them as best to thee doth seeme,
And all their actions to direct aright;
The fatal purpose of divine foresight
Thou dost effect in destined descents,
Through deep impression of thy secret might;
And stirredst up the heroes high intents,
Which the late world admires for wondrous monuments.

Wondrous it is to see in diverse mindes,
How diversely Love doth his pageants play,
And shews his power in variable kinds:
The baser wit, whose idle thoughts alway,
Are wont to cleave unto the lowly clay,
It stirreth up to sensual desire,
And in lewd sloth to wast its careless day;
But in brave sprite it kindles goodly fire,
That to all high desert and honour doth aspire.

Ne suffereth uncomely idleness
In his free thought to build her sluggish nest;
Ne suffereth it thought of ungentleness,
Ever to creep into his noble brest;
But to the highest and the worthiest
Lifteth it up, that else would lowly fall:
It lets not fall, it lets it not to rest:
It lets not scarce this prince to breathe at
all,
But to his first pursuit him forward still doth
call.

§ 87. Madness.

WITH hundred iron chains he did him bind,
An hundred knotts that did him sore con-
straine:

Yet his great iron teeth he still did grinde,
And grimly gnash, threatning revenge in vaine:
His burning eyn, whom bloody strakes did staine,
Stared full wide, and threw forth sparks of
fire;
And more for ranke despight, then for great
paine,
Shak't his long locks, colour'd like copper wire,
And bit his tawny beard to shew his raging ire.

LIKE as a mastiffe, having at a bay
A salvage bull, whoes cruel hornes do threat
Desperate danger, if he them assay,
Traceth his ground, and round about doth beat,
To spy where he may some advantage get;
The whilst the beast doth rage and loudly roar.

OF second sister, who did far excel
The other two; Medina was her name,
A sober, sad, and comely courteous dame;
Who rich array'd, and yet in modest guise,
In goodly garments, that her well became,
Faire marching forth in honourable wise,
Him at the threshold met, and well did enterprize.

She led him up into a goodly bowre,
 And comely courted with meet modestie,
 Ne in her speech, ne in her haviour,
 Was lightness seen, or looser vanitie,
 But gracious womanhood, and gravitie,
 Above the reason of her youthful years:
 Her golden locks she roundly did uptie
 In braided trammells, that no looser hares
 Did out of order stray about her dainty cares.
 Betwixt them both the fair Medina sate,
 With sober grace, and goodly carriage:
 With equall measure she doth moderate
 The strong extremities of their outrage:
 That forward pair she ever would assuage,
 When they would strive due reason to exceed;
 But that same froward twaine would accourage,
 And of her plenty adde unto their need:
 So kept she them in order, and herself in heed.

§ 90. Mercy.

THEY, passing by, were guided by degree
 Unto the pressance of that gracious queen:
 Who sate on high, that she might all men see,
 And might of all men royally be seene,
 Upon a throne of gold full bright and sheene;
 Adorned all with gemmes of endless price,
 As either might for wealth have gotten been,
 Or could be fram'd by workman's rare device;
 And all embost with lyons and with flowre-delice.

And over all her cloth of state was spread,
 Not of rich tisew, nor of cloth of gold,
 Nor of aught else that may be richest red,
 But like a cloud, as likest may be told,
 That her broad spreading wings did wide unfold;

Whose skirts were bordered with bright
 sunny beames,
 Glistring like gold, amongst the plights enrolld,
 And here and there shooting forth silver streames,
 'Mongst which crept the little angels through the glittering gleames.

Seemed those little angels did uphold
 The cloth of state, and on their purpled wings
 Did bear the pendants, thro' their nimble
 bold,
 Besides a thousand more of such, as sings
 Hymnes to high God, and carols heavenly things,

Encompassed the throne, on which she sate:
 She angel-like, the heir of ancient kings
 And mighty conquerors, in royal state,
 Whilst kings and Cæsars at her feet did them prostrate.

Thus she did sit in sovereign majestie,
 Holding a sceptre in her royal hand,
 The sacred pledge of peace and clemencie,
 With which high God had blest her happy land,
 Maugre so many foes which did withstand.

But at her feet her sword was likewise layd,
 Whose long rest rusted the bright steely brand,
 Yet when as foes enforc't, or friends sought ayde, [maide.
 She could it sternly draw, that all the world dis-

And round about before her feet there sate
 A beauteie of faire virgins clad in white,
 That goodly seem'd t' adorne her royal state,
 All lovely daughters of high Jove, that hight
 Litæ, by him begot in love's delight,
 Upon the righteous Themis: those they say
 Upon Jove's judgment-seat waite day and night,
 And when in wrath he threatens the world's decay,
 They do his anger calme, and cruel vengeance stay.

They also doe, by his divine permission,
 Upon the thrones of mortal princes tend,
 And often treat for pardon and remission
 To suppliants through frailtie which offend;
 Those did upon Marcillæ's throne attend:
 Just Dice, wise Eunomie, mild Eirene;
 And them amongst, her glory to commend,
 Sate goodly Temperance, in garments clene,
 And sacred Reverence, yborne of heavenly strene.

Some clerks doe doubt in their deviceful art,
 Whether this heavenly thing, whereof I treat,
 To weeten, mercy, be of justice part,
 Or drawne forth from her by divine extreate.
 This well I wote; that sure she is as great,
 And meriteth to have as high a place,
 Sith in th' Almighty's everlasting seat
 She first was bred, and borne of heavenly race; [of grace.

From thence pour'd down on men, by influence
 For if that virtue be of that great might,
 Which from just verdict will for nothing start,
 But to preserve inviolated right,
 Oft spoils the principal to save the part;
 So much more then is that of powre and art,
 That seekes to save the subject of her skill,
 Yet never doth for doom of right depart:
 As it is greater praise to save, than spill;
 And better to reforme, than to cut off the ill.

§ 91. Minerva.

LIKE as Minerva, being late return'd
 From slaughter of the giants conquered:
 Where proud Encelade, whose wide nostrils
 burn'd
 With breathed flames, like to a furnace red,
 Transfix'd with his spear, down tumbled dead
 From top of Hemus, by him heaped hie,
 Hath loos'd her helmet from her lofty head,
 And her Gorgonian shield gins to untie

§ 92. Morning.

AT last fair Hesperus, in his highest sky
 Had spent his lamp, and brought forth dawning
 light,
 Then up he rose, and clad him hastily;
 The dwarfe him brought his steed: so both away did fly.

Another.

Now when the rosy-finger'd morning faire,
 Weary of aged Tithon's saffron bed,

Had spread her purple robe through dewy air,
And the high hills Titan discovered,
The royal virgin shook her drowsy head.

Another.

At last the golden oriental gate
Of greatest heaven gan to open faire,
And Phœbus fresh, as bridegroom to his mate,
Came dancing forth, shaking his dewy hair:
And hurles his glistening beams thro' gloomy air.

Another.

Soon as the fiery streaks with purple beams
Disperse the shadows of the misty night,
And Titan playing on the eastern streames,
Gan clear the dewy air with springing light:
So soon as day, forth dawning from the east,
Night's humid curtain from the heavens withdrew,
And early calling forth both man and beast,
Commanded them their daily works renew.

It was an hill plac'd in an open plain,
That round about was bordered with a wood
Of matchless height, that seem'd th' earth to disdain,
In which all trees of honour stately stood,
And did all winter as in summer bud,
Spreading pavilions for the birds to bowre,
Which in the lowly branches sung aloud,
And in their tops the soaring hawk did towre,
Sitting like king of fowles in majesty and powre.

And at the foot thereof, a gentle flood
His silver waves did softly tumble down,
Unmarr'd with ragged moss or filthy mud;
Ne mote wild beasts, ne mote the ruder clown
There to approach, ne filth mote therein
drowne:

But nymphs and faeries by the banks did sit,
In the wood shade, which did the waters
crown,

Keeping all noisome things away from it,
And to the waters fall tuning their accents fit.

And on the top thereof a spacious plain
Did spread itself, to serve to all delight, Either to dance, when they to dance would
faine,

Or else to course about their bases light:
Ne ought there wanted, which for pleasure
might

Desired be, or thence to banish bale:
So pleasantly the hill, with equal height,
Did seem to overlook the lowly vale,
Therefore it rightly cleped was Mount Acidale.

§ 94. Mutability.

SUCH is the weakness of all mortall hope;
So fickle is the state of earthly things,
That ere they come into their aimed scope,
They fall so short of our fraile reckonings,

And bring us bale and bitter sorrowings,
Instead of comfort which we should embrace:

This is the state of Cæsars and of kings.

Let none therefore that is in meaner place,
Too greatly grieve at any his unlucky case.

§ 95. Night.

WHERE griesly Night, with visage deadly sad,
That Phœbus' chearfull face durst never view,
And in a foul black pitchy mantle clad,
She finds forth coming from her darksome
mew,

Where she all day did hide her hated hew.

Before the door her iron chariot stood,
Already harnessed for journey new;

And coal-black steeds yborne of hellish brood,
That on their rusty bits did champ, as they were
wood.

By this, eternall lamps, where-with high Jove
Did light the world, were half yspent,
And the moist daughters of huge Atlas shove
In the ocean deep to drive their wearied rove,

Now when as all the world in silence deep
Yshrowded was, and every mortal wight
Was drowned in the depth of deadly sleep.

Night, thou foule mother of annoyance sad,
Sister of heavy death, and nurse of woe,
Which was begot in heaven, but for thy bad
And brutish shape, thrust down to hell below,

Where, by the grim flood of Cocytus slowe,
That dwelling is Herebus' black hous,
(Black Herebus, thy husband, is the foe
Of all the Gods) where thou ungracious,
Half of thy days doest lead in horreur hedeous.

What had th' Eternal Maker need of thee,
The world in his continual course to keep,
That doest all things deface, ne lettest see
The beauties of his work? Indeed in sleep
The slothful body doth love to steep
His lustless limbs, and drowne his baser mind;
Doth praise thee oft, and oft from Stygian deep,
Calls thee his goddess, in his error blind,
And great dame Nature's hand-maid chearing
every kind.

But well I wote, that to an heavy heart
Thou art the root and nurse of bitter cares,
Breeder of new, renewer of old smart;
Instead of rest, thou lendest rayling tears,
And dreadful visions, in the which alive,
The dreary image of sad death appears:
So from the warie spirite thou dost drive
Desired rest, and men of happiness deprive.

Under thy mantle black there hidden lye,
Light-shunning theft, and trayterous intent,
Abhorred bloodshed, and vile felony,
Shameful deceit, and danger imminent:
Foule horror, and eke hellish dreriment:

All these (I wote) in thy protection bee,
And light doe shunne, for fear being shent:
For, light ylike is loth'd of them and thee,
And all that lewdness love, doe hate the light to see.

For day discovers all dishonest wayes,
 And sheweth each thing as it is indeed;
 The praises of high God he fair displayes,
 And his large bounty rightly doth areed,
 Days blessed children be the blessed seed,
 Which darkness shall subdue, and heaven
 win:
 Truth is his daughter, he her first did breed,
 Most sacred virgin, without spot or sin:
 Our life is day; but death with darkness doth begin.

Now gan the humid vapour shed the ground
 With pearly dew, and the earth's gloomy shade
 Did dim the brightness of the welkin round,
 That every bird and beast awarned made
 To shrowd themselves, while sleep their senses did invade.

§ 96. Occasion.

AND him behind, a wicked hagg did stalke,
 In ragged robes, and filthy disarray;
 Her other leg was lame, that she no'te walk,
 But on a staff her feeble steps did stay;
 Her locks, that loathly were, and hoary grey,
 Grew all afore, and loosely hung unroll'd;
 But all behind was bald, and worn away,
 That none thereof could ever taken hold,
 And eke her face ill-favour'd, full of wrinkles
 old.

And ever as she went, her tongue did walk
 In foul reproach, and terms of foul despight,
 Provoking him, by her outrageous talk,
 To heap more vengeance on that wretched
 wight.
 Sometimes she raught him stones, wherewith to smite,
 Sometimes her staff, tho' it her own leg were,
 Withouten which she could not go upright;
 Ne evil means she did forbear,
 That might him move to wrath, and indignation reare.

§ 97. Palace of Sleep.

To Morpheus' house doth hastily repaire:
 Amid the bowels of the earth full steep
 And lowe, where dawning day doth never peep,
 His dwelling is; there Thetys his wet bed
 Doth ever wash, and Cynthia still doth steep
 In silver dew his ever drouping head,
 Whiles sad night over him her mantle black doth spread.
 Whose double gates he findeth locked fast,
 The one fair fram'd with burnish'd ivory,
 The other all with silver overcast;
 And wakefull dogges before them farre doe lye,
 Watching to banish Care their enemy,
 Who oft is wont to trouble gentle sleep.
 By them the spright doth pass in quietly,
 And unto Morpheus comes, whom drowned
 deep,
 In drowsie fit he finds of nothing he takes keep.
 And more to lull him in his slumbers soft,
 A trickling stream from high rock tumbling
 down,

And ever drizzling raine upon the loft,
 Mixt with a murmuring wind, much like the
 sound
 Of swarming bees, did cast him in a swoone:
 No other noise, nor peoples troublous cries,
 As still are wont t'annoy the walled town,
 Might there be heard: but careless quiet lies,
 Wrapt in eternal silence, farre from enemies.

§ 98. Tyger.

As when two tygers, pinch'd with hunger's
 rage,
 Have by good fortune found some beast's fresh spoyle,
 On which they ween their famin to asswage,
 And gaine a feastful guerdon of their toyle,
 Both falling out, do stir up strife-full broyle,
 And cruel battell 'twixt themselves do make,
 Whiles neither lets the other touch the spoyle,
 But either 'sdeignes with other to partake.

Another.

As when a tyger and a lyoness
 Are met a spoyling of some hungry prey,
 Both challenge it with equal greediness:
 But first the tyger clawes thereon did lay;
 And therefore, loth to loos her right away,
 Doth in defence thereof full stoutly stond,
 To which the lyon strongly doth gainsay,
 That she to hunt the beast first took in hond:
 And therefore ought it have, wherever she it found.

§ 99. Winds.

—LIKE as a boist'rous wind,
 Which in th' earth's hollow caves hath long been hid,
 And shut up fast within her prisons blind,
 Makes the huge element against her kind
 To move, and tremble as it were aghast,
 Until that it an issue forth may find,
 Then forth it breakes, and with his furious blast
 Confounds both land and seas, and sky doth overcast.

As when two Suns appear in th' azure sky,
 Mounted in Phœbus' chariot fierie bright:
 Both darting forth faire beamies to each man's
 eye,
 And both adorn'd with lamps of flaming light,
 All that behold such strange prodigious sight,
 Not knowing nature's work, nor what to weene,
 Are wrapt with wonder and with rare af-fright.

§ 101. Phaeton.

EXCEEDING shone, like Phœbus' fairest childe,
 That did presume his father's fierie waine,
 And flaming mouthes of steeds unwonted wild,
 Thro' highest heaven with weaker hand to raine,
 Proud of such glory and advancement yaine,

While flashing beams doe daze his feeble
 eye,
 He leeves the wilkin way most beaten plaine,
 And wrapt with whirling wheels enflame the skyen
 With fire not made to burn, but fairly for to shine.

THE first troupe was a monstrous rabblement
 Of fowle mishapen wights, of which some were Headed like owles, with beakes uncomely bent,

Others like dogs, others like gryphons dreare,
 And some had wings, and some had clawes to teare,

And every one of them had lynxes eyes,
 And every one did bowe and arrowes beare.

All those were lawless lusts, corrupt envies,
 And covetous aspects, all cruel enemies.

Those same against the bulwarke of the fight
 Did lay strong siege, and battailous assault,

Ne once did yield it respite day or night,
 But soon as Titan gan his head exault,

And soon again as he his light withhault,

Their wicked engines they against it bent:
 That is, each thing by which the eyes may fault;

But two than all more huge and violent,
 Beauty and money, they that bulwark sorely rent.

§ 103. Slander.

So when that forest they had passed well,
 A little cottage farre away they spide,

To which they drew, ere night upon them
 fell:

And entering in, found none therein abide,
 But an old woman sitting there beside,

Upon the ground, in ragged rude attire,
 With filthy locks about her scatter'd wide,

Gnawing her nayles for felness and for ire,
 And thereout sucking venom to her parts intire.

A foule and loathly creature sure in sight,
 And in conditions to be loath'd no less:

For shee was stufte with rancour and de-spight

Up to the throat; that oft with bitterness
 It forth would break, and gush with great excess,

Pouring out streams of poyson and of gall,
 Gainst all that truth or virtue doe professe;

Whome she with lessings lewdly did miscall
 And wickedly back-bite: her name men Slander
 call.

Her nature is, all goodness to abuse,
 And causeless crimes continually to frame;

With which she guiltless persons may accuse,
 And steale away the crowne of their good name:
 Ne ever knight so bold, ne ever dame

So chaste and loyall liv'd, but she would strive
 With forged cause them falsely to defame:

Ne ever thing was done so well alive,
 But she with blame would blot, and of due praise deprive.

Her words were not as common words are
 ment,

T' express the meaning of the inward minde;
 But noisome breath, and poysonous spirit
 sent,

From inward parts, with cancar'd malice lin'd,
 And breathed forth with blast of bitter winde;
 Which passing thro' the eares, would pierce
 the heart,

And wound the soul itself with grief unkind:
 For, like the stings of aspes, that kill with smart,

Her spiteful words did prick and wound the inner part.

§ 104. Storm.

HER cryde, as rageing seas are wont to rore,
 When wintry storme his wrathfull wreck does threat,

The rolling billows beat the rugged shore,
 As they the earth would shoulder from her seat,
 And greedy gulph does gape, as he would eat
 His neighbour element in his revenge:

Then gin the blustering breathren boldly threat,
 To move the world from off his steadfast
 henge,

And boystrous battell make, each other to avenge.

Another.

LIKE to a storm that hovers under skie
 Long here and there, and round about doth flie,

At length breaks downe in raine, and haile and sleet,

First from one coast, till nought thereof be dry:

And then another, till that likewise fleet:
 And so from side to side, till all the world be weet.

§ 105. Superstition.

WHERE that old woman day and night did pray

Upon her beades devoutly penitent;

Nine hundred Pater-nosters every day,

And thrice nine hundred Aves she was wont
 to say,

And to augment her painful penance more,

Thrice every week in ashes she did sit,

And next her wrinkled skin rough sackcloth
 wore,

And thrice three times did fast from any bite.

Upon the image which his naked blade

Three times, as in defiance, there he stroke;

And the third time, out of an hidden shade,

There forth issued from under the altar smoake
 A dreadful fiend, with foul deformed look,

That stretcht itself, as it had long lain still,

That her long taile and feathers strongly shook,

That all the temple did with terror fill;

Yet him nought terrified, that feared nothing ill.

An huge great beast it was, when it in length
 Was stretched forth, that nigh fill'd all the place,

And seem'd to be of infinite great strength ;
Horrible, hideous, and of hellish race,
Borne of the brooding of Echidna base,
Or other like infernal furies kind :
For of a maide she had the outwarde face,
To hide the horreur which did lurk behind,
The better to beguile whom she so fond did
find.

Thereto the body of a dog she had,
Full of fell ravin and fierce greediness ;
A lyon's clawes with power and rigour clad,
To rend and teare what so she can oppress ;
And dragon's taile, whose sting without redress

Full deadly wounds, when so it is empight ;
An eagle's wings for scope, and speediness,
That nothing might escape her ravening
might.

Whereto she ever list to make her hardy flight.

Much like in foulness and deformitie
Unto that monster, whom the Theban knight,

The father of that fatal progeny,
Made kill herself for very heart's despight,
That he had red her riddle, which no wight

Could ever loose, but suffred deadly doole :
So also did this monster use like slight

To many a one, which came into her school,
Whom she did put to death, deceived like a fool.

§ 106. Suspicion.

BUT he was foule, ill-favoured, and grim,
Under his eye-brows looking still ascaunce ;
And ever as dissemblance laught on him,
He lower'd on her with dangerous eye-glance,
Shewing his nature in his countenance ;

His rolling eyes did never rest in place,
But walkt each way for fear of hid mischance,
Holding a lattice still before his face,
Thro' which he still did peep as forward he did pass.

§ 107. Venus.

RIGHT in the midst the goddess self did
stand,

Upon an altar of some costly masse,
Whose substance was uneath to understand :
For neither precious stones, nor durefull brasse,
Nor shining gold, nor mouldring clay it was ;
But yet more rare and precious to esteeme,
Pure in aspect, and like to chrystall glass ;
Yet glass was not, if one did rightly deem ;
But being faire and brittle, likest glass did seeme.

But it in shape and beauty did excell
All other idols which the heathen adore :

Farre passing that, which by surpassing skill
Phidias did make in Paphos isle of yore,
With which that wretched Greeke that life for-lore

Did fall in love : yet this much fairer shined,
But covered with slender veil afore,

And both her feet and legs together twined
Were with a snake, whose head and taile were fast combined.

The cause why she was covered with a veile,
Was hard to know, for that her priests the same [ceale ;

From people's knowledge labour'd to con-
But sooth it was not sure for womanish shame,
Nor any blemish which the work mote blame ;
But for (they say) she hath both kinds in one,

Both male and female, both under one name :
She sire and mother is herself alone ;
Begets, and eke conceives, she needeth other none.

And all about her neck and shoulders flew
A flock of little loves, and sports, and joyes,
With nimble wings of gold and purple hew ;
Whoes shapes seem'd not like to terrestrial boyes,
But like to angels playing heavenly toyes ;

The whilst their elder brother was away,
Cupid, their elder brother ; he enjoys
The wide kingdome of love with lordly sway,
And to his law compels all creatures to obey.

And all about her altar scatter'd lay,
Great sorts of lovers piteously complaining,
Some of their loss, some of their love's delay,
Some of their pride, some paragons disdainning,
Some fearing fraude, some fraudulently fayning,
As ever one had cause of good or ill.

§ 108. Temple of Venus.

THE temple of great Venus, that is hight
The queen of beauty, and of love the mother,
There worshipped of every living wight :
Whose goodly workmanship farre past all other
That ever were on earth, all were they set together.

Not that same famous temple of Diane,
Whose height all Ephesus did oversee,
And which all Asia sought with vows profane,
One of the world's seven wonders said to be,
Might match with this by many a degree :

Nor that, which that wise king of Jurie framed,
With endless cost to be the Almighty's see ;
Nor all that else thro' all the world is named
To all the heathen gods, might like to this be clamed.

I, much admiring that so goodly frame,
Unto the porch approacht, which open stood,
But therein sat an amiable dame,
That seem'd to be of very sober mood,
And in her semblant show'd great womanhood :
Strange was her tire ; for on her head a crown
She wore, much like unto a Danisk hood,
Poudred with pearl and stone ; and all her gowne

Enwoven was with gold, that raught full low adowne.

On either side of her two young men stood,
Both strongly arm'd, as fearing one another,
Yet were they brethren both of half the blood,
Begotten by two fathers of one mother,
Though of contrary natures each to other :

The one of them hight Love, the other Hate,
Hate was the elder, Love the younger brother ;

Yet was the younger stronger in his state
Than th' elder, and him mastred still in all debate.

Nath'less that dame so well them tempred both
That she them forced hand to join in hand,
Albe that Hatred was thereof full loth,
And turn'd his face away as he did stand,
Unwilling to behold that lovely band.

Yet she was of such grace and vertuous might,
That her commandment he could not with-
stand,
But bit his lips for felonous despight,
And gnasht his iron tusks at that displeasing
sight.

Concord she cleeped was in common reed,
Mother of blessed Peace, and Friendship true ;
They both her twins, both born of heavenly
seed,
And she herself likewise divinely grew ;
The which right well her works divine did shew : [lends,

For strength, and wealth, and happiness, she
And strife, and war, and anger, does subdue :
Of little, much, of foes she maketh friends,
And to afflicted minds sweet rest and quiet sends.

By her the heaven is in his course contained,
And all the world in state unmoved stands,
As their Almighty Maker first ordained,
And bound them with inviolable bands ;
Else would the waters overflow the lands,
And fire devour the aire, and hell them quite,
But that she holds them with her blessed hands.
She is the nurse of pleasure and delight,
And unto Venus grace the gate doth open right.

Into the inmost temple thus I came,
Which fuming all with frankencense I found,
And odours rising from the altars flame :
Upon an hundred marble pillars round,
The roof up high was reared from the ground,
All deckt with crowns, and chains, and gir-
londs gay,
A thousand precious gifts worth many a pound,
The which sad lovers for their vowes did
pay ;
And all the ground was strew'd with flowers as fresh as May.

An hundred altars round about were set,
All flaming with their sacrifices fire,
That with the steme thereof the temple swet,
Which rould in cloudes, to heaven did aspire,
And in them bore true lovers' vows entire :
And eke an hundred brazen cauldrons bright
To bathe in joy and amorous desire,
Every which was to a damzell hight ;
For all the priests were damzells, in soft linnen
dight.

§ 109. Wrath.

AFTER that varlet's sight, it was not long
Ere on the plaine fast pricking Guion spide,
One in bright arms embattailed full strong,
That as the sunny beams doe glance and glide

Upon the trembling wave, so shined bright,
And round about him threw forth sparkling
fire,

That seemed him to enflame on every side :
His steed was bloody red, and foamed ire,
When with the maist'ring spur he did him roughly stire.

Approaching nigh he never staid to greet,
Ne chaffer words, proud courage to provoke,
But prickt so fierce, that underneath his feet
The smoldring dust did round about him smoke,
Both horse and man nigh able for to choke ;
And fairly couching his steel-headed spear,
Him first saluted with a sturdy stroke.

And him beside rides fierce revenging Wrath,
Upon a lyon, loth for to be led ;
And in his hand a burning brond he hath,
The which he brandisheth about his head ;
His eyes did hurle forth sparkles fiery red,
And stared stern on all that him beheld,
As ashes pale of hue, and seeming dead ;
And on his dagger still his hand he held,
Trembling thro' hasty rage, when choler in him swell'd.

His ruffin raiment all was stain'd in blood
Which he had spilt, and all to rage yrent,
Thro' unadvised rashness woxen wood,
For of his hands he had no government,
Ne car'd for bloud in his avengement ;
But when the furious fit was overpast,
His cruel facts he often would repent,
Yet, wilful man, he never would forecast,
How many mischiefs should ensue his heedless hast !

Full many mischiefs follow cruel Wrath ;
Abhorred bloudshed, and tumultuous strife,
Unmanly murther, and unthrifty scath,
Bitter despight, with rancour's rusty knife,
And fretting grief, the enemy of life,
And these and many evils more haunt ire,
The swelling splene, and phrenzy raging rife,
The shaking palsey, and St. Francis' fire,
Such one was Wrath, the last of this ungodly tire.

SPENSER'S FAIRY QUEEN.

§ 110. Duessa weeping over her Enemy, compared to a Crocodile ; and a Description of Night.

As when a weary traveller, that strays
By muddy shore of broad seven-mouthed Nile,
Unweeting of the perilous wandering ways,
Doth meet a cruel crafty crocodile,
Which in false grief hiding his harmless guile
Doth weep full sore, and sheddeth tender tears :
The foolish man, that pities all this while
His mournful plight, is swallow'd up unawares, Forgetful of his own, that minds another's cares.

So wept Duessa until even tide,
That shining lamps in Jove's high house were
light ;

Then forth she rose, ne longer would abide,
But comes unto the place where th' heathen knight

In slumb'ring swoon nigh void of vital spright,
Lay cover'd with enchanted cloud all day;
Whom when she found, as she him left in plight

To wail his woful case, she would not stay,
But to the eastern coast of heaven makes speedy
way,

Where griesly Night, with visage deadly sad,
That Phœbus' cheerful face durst never view,
And in a foul black pitchy mantle clad,
She finds forth-coming from her darksome
mew,

Where she all day did hide her hated hue :
Before the door her iron chariot stood,
Already harnessed for journey new ;
And cole-black steeds yborn of hellish brood,
That on their rusty bits did champ as they were
wood.

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakeful dogs did never cease to bay,
As giving warning of th' unusual sound,
With which her iron wheels did them affray,
And her dark griesly look them much dismay.
The messenger of death, the ghastly owl,
With dreary shrieks did also her bewray ;
And hungry wolves continually did howl
At her abhorred face, so filthy and so foul.

—————On every side them stood
The trembling ghosts with sad amazed mood
Chattering their iron teeth, and staring wide
With stony eyes ; and all the hellish brood
Of fiends infernal flock'd on every side,
To gaze on earthly wight, that with the Night
durst ride.

§ 111. Description of Lucifer's Palace.

A STately palace built of squared brick,
Which cunningly was without mortar laid,
Whose walls were high, but nothing strong nor thick,
And golden foil all over them display'd ;
That purest sky with brightness they dismay'd :
High lifted up were many lofty tow'rs,
And goodly galleries far over-laid,
Full of fair windows, and delightful bow'rs ;
And on the top a dial told the timely hours.

It was a goodly heap for to behold,
And spake the praises of the workman's wit ;
But full great pity, that so fair a mould
Did on so weak foundation ever sit ;
For on a sandy hill, that still did flit
And fall away, it mounted was full high,
That every breath of heaven shook it ;
And all the hinder parts, that few could spy,
Were ruinous and old, but painted cunningly.

§ 112. Lucifera ascending her Coach.

SUDDEN upriseth from her stately place
The royal dame, and for her coach doth call !

All hurlen forth, and she with princely pace,
As fair Aurora in her purple pall,
Out of the East the dawning day doth call.
So forth she comes : her brightness broad doth blaze.

The heaps of people thronging in the hall
Do ride each other, upon her to gaze :
Her glorious glittering light doth all men's eyes amaze.

So forth she comes, and to her coach does climb

Adorned all with gold, and garlands gay,
That seem'd as fresh as Flora in her prime ;
And strove to match, in royal rich array,
Great Juno's golden chair, the which they say
The gods stand gazing on, when she does ride
To Jove's high house thro' heaven's brass-paved
way.

Drawn of fair peacocks that excel in pride,
And full of Argus' eyes their tails dispredden
wide.

§ 113. Description of Prince Arthur in his Habili-ments of War.

UPON the top of all his lofty crest,
A bunch of hairs, discolour'd diversly
With sprinkled pearl, and gold full richly drest,
Did shake, and seem'd to dance for jollity,
Like to an almond tree ymounted high
On top of green Selinis all alone,
With blossoms brave bedecked daintily ;
Whose tender locks do tremble every one
At every little blast that under heaven is blown.

§ 114. Description of Diana with her Nymphs, returned from the Chace, and preparing to bathe.

SHORTLY under the wasteful woods she came,
Whereat she found the goddess and her crew,
After late chace of their embred game
Sitting beside a fountain in a row,
Some of them washing with the liquid dew
From off their dainty limbs the dusty sweat,
And soil, which did deform their lively hue ;
Others lay shaded from the scorching heat ;
The rest upon her person gave attendance great.
She having hong upon a bough on high
Her bow and painted quiver, had unlac'd
Her silver buskins from her nimble thigh.
And her lank loins ungirt, and breasts unbrac'd,
After her heat the breathing cold to taste ;
Her golden locks that late in tresses bright
Embred were for hindering of her haste,
Now loose about her shoulders long undight,
And were with sweet ambrosia all besprinkled
light.

Soon as she Venus saw behind her back,
She was asham'd to be so loose surpris'd;
And wox half wroth against her damsels slack,
That had not her thereof before advis'd,
But suffer'd her so carelessly disguis'd
Be overtaken. Soon her garments loosen
Uppgathering in her bosom she compris'd,

Well, as she might, and then the goddess
rose: [close.
Whilst all her nymphs did like a girlond heren-

§ 115. Description of a Garden.

EFTSOONS they heard a most delicious sound
Of all that mote delight a dainty ear;
Such as at once might not on living ground,
Save in this paradise, be heard elsewhere:
Right hard it was for wight which did it hear,
To read what manner music that mote be,
For all that pleasing is to living ear
Was there consorted in one harmony;
Birds, voices, instruments, winds, waters, all agree.

The joyous birds, shrouded in cheerful shade,
Their notes unto the voice attemper'd sweet;
Th' angelical, soft trembling voices made
To th' instruments divine respondence meet:
The silver-sounding instruments did meet
With the base murmur of the waters fall;
The waters fall, with difference discreet,
Now soft, now loud, unto the wind did call;
The gentle warbling wind low answered to all.

§ 116. Description of the Garden of Adonis.

THERE is continual spring and harvest there,
Continual, both meeting at one time;
For both the boughs do laughing blossoms bear,
And with fresh colours deck the wanton prime,
And eke at once the heavy trees they climb,
Which seem to labour under their fruits load:
The whiles the joyous birds make their pastime
Emongst the shady leaves, their sweet abode,
And their true loves without suspicion tell abroad.

§ 117. Devastation which Time makes in this Garden.

Great enemy to it and all the rest
That in the garden of Adonis springs,
Is wicked Time, who, with his scythe addrest,
Does mow the flow'ring herbs and goodly
things,
And all their glory to the ground down flings,
Where they do wither, and are foully marr'd:
He flies about, and with his flaggy wings
Beats down both leaves and buds without regard,
Ne ever pity may relent his malice hard.

§ 118. Description of Jupiter.

So having said he ceas'd, and with his brow
His black eye-brow, whose doomful dreaded beck
Is wont to wield the world unto his vow,
And even the highest pow'rs of heaven to check,
Made sign to them in their degrees to speak.

With that he shook
His nectar-dewed locks, with which the skies,
And all the world beneath for terror quook,
And eft his burning leven-brond in hand he took.

§ 119. Guyon conducted by Mammon through a Cave under Ground, to see his Treasure.

AT length they came into a larger space
That stretch'd itself into an ample plain,
Through which a beaten broad highway did
trace,
That straight did lead to Pluto's griesly reign:
By that way's side there sat infernal Pain,
And fast beside him sat tumultuous Strife;
The one in hand an iron whip did strain,
The other brandished a bloody knife,
And both did knash their teeth, and both did threaten life.

On the other side in one consort there sate
Cruel Revenge, and rancorous Despite,
Disloyal Treason, and heart-burning Hate;
But gnawing Jealousy, out of their sight
Sitting alone, his bitter lips did bite:
And trembling Fear still to and fro did fly,
And found no place where safe he shroud him
might.

Lamenting Sorrow did in darkness lie,
And Shame his ugly face did hide from living
eye.

And over them sad Horror, with grim hue,
Did always soar, beating his iron wings;
And after him owls and night-ravens flew,
The hateful messengers of heavy things,
Of death and dolour telling sad tidings;
Whilst sad Celeno, sitting on a cliff,
A song of bale and bitter sorrows sings,
That heart of flint asunder would have rift;
Which having ended, after him she flieth swift.

§ 120. Description of Despair, and her Speech.

ERE long they come, where that same wicked
wight
His dwelling has, low in an hollow cave,
Far underneath a craggy clift ypight,
Dark, doleful, dreary, like a greedy grave,
That still for carion carcasses doth crave:
On top whereof ay dwelt the ghastly owl,
Shrieking his baneful note, which ever drave
Far from that haunt all other cheerful fowl:
And all about it wand'ring ghosts did wail and howl.

And all about, old stocks and stubs of trees,
Whereon nor fruit nor leaf was ever seen,
Did hang upon the ragged rocky knees;
On which had many wretches hanged been,
Whose carcasses were scatter'd on the green,
And thrown about the cliffs. Arrived there
That bare-head knight, for dread and doleful teen,
Would fain have fled, ne durst approachen
near:
But th' other forc'd him stay, and comforted
in fear.

The darksome cave they enter, where they find
That cursed man low sitting on the ground,
Musing full sadly in his sullen mind;
His greasy locks, long growing and unbound,
Disordered hung about his shoulders round,
And hid his face: thro' which his hollow eyne
Look'd deadly dull, and stared as astound;
His raw-bone cheeks, through penury and pine,
Were shrunk into his jaws, as he did never dine.

His garment, nought but many ragged clouts,
With thorns together pinn'd and patched was,
The which his naked sides he wrapp'd abouts:
And him beside there lay upon the grass
A dreary corse, whose life away did pass,
All wallow'd in his own yet lukewarm blood,
That from his wound yet welled fresh, alas!
In which a rusty knife fast fixed stood,
And made an open passage for the gushing
flood.

Which piteous spectacle, approving true
The woful tale that Trevisan had told,
When as the gentle Red Cross knight did view,
With fiery zeal he burnt in courage bold,
Him to avenge before his blood were cold;
And to the villain said: Thou damned wight!
The author of this fact, we here behold,
What justice can but judge against thee right,
With thine own blood to price his blood, here shed in sight.

What frantic fit (quoth he) hath thus distaught
Thee, foolish man, so rash a doom to give?
What justice ever other judgement taught,
But he should die, who merits not to live?
None else to death this man despairing drive
But his own guilty mind deserving death.
Is then unjust to each his due to give?
Or let him die, that loatheth living breath?
Or let him die at ease, that liveth here uneath?

Who travels by the weary wand'ring way,
To come unto his wished home in haste,
And meets a flood that doth his passage stay,
Is not great grace to help him over-past,
Or free his feet, that in the mire stick fast?
Most envious man! that grieves at neighbour's
good:

And fond, that joyest in the woe thou hast;
Why wilt not let him pass, that long hath stood
Upon the bank, yet wilt thyself not pass the flood?

He there does now enjoy eternal rest,
And happy ease, which thou dost want and crave,

And further from it daily wanderest:
What if some little pain the passage have,
That makes frail flesh to fear the bitter wave?
Is not short pain well borne, that brings long
ease,

And lays the soul to sleep in quiet grave?
Sleep after toil, port after stormy seas,
Ease after war, death after life, does greatly
please.

The knight much wonder'd at his sudden wit,
And said: The term of life is limited,

Ne may a man prolong or shorten it:
The soldier may not move from watchful sted,
Nor leave his stand until his captain bed.
Who life did limit by almighty doom
(Quoth he) knows best the terms established:
And he that 'points the centinel in his room,
Doth licence him depart at sound of morning
droom.

Is not his deed, whatever thing is done,
In heaven and earth? Did not he all create
To die again? All ends that was begun;
Their times in his eternal book of fate
Are written sure, and have their certain date,
Who then can strive with strong necessity,
That holds the world in his still changing
state,
Or shun the death ordain'd by destiny?
When hour of death is come, let none ask whence, nor why.

The longer life, I wote the greater sin,
The greater sin, the greater punishment;
All those great battles which thou boasts to
win,

Thro' strife, and bloodshed, and avengement,
Now prais'd, hereafter dear thou shalt repent.
For life must life, and blood must blood repay.
Is not enough thy evil life forespent?
For he that once hath missed the right way,
The further he doth go, the further he doth stray.

Then do no further go, no further stray,
But here lie down, and to thy rest betake,
Th' ill to prevent, that life ensuen may:
For what hath life, that may it loved make,
And gives not rather cause it to forsake?
Fear, sickness, age, loss, labour, sorrow, strife,
Pain, hunger, cold, that makes the heart to quake;

And ever fickle fortune rageth rife,
And which, and thousands more, do make a loathsome life.

Thou, wretched man, of death hath greatest need,

If in true balance thou wilt weigh thy state;
For never knight that dared warlike deed
More luckless adventures did amate:
Witness the dungeon deep, wherein of late
Thy life shut up, for death so oft did call:
And tho' good luck prolonged hath thy date,
Yet death then would the like mishaps forestall, [fall.

Into the which hereafter thou mayst happen

Why then dost thou, O man of sin, desire
To draw thy days forth to their last degree?
Is not the measure of thy sinful hire
High heaped up with huge iniquity,
Against the day of wrath, to burden thee?
Is not enough, that to this lady mild
Thou falsed hast thy face with perjury,
And sold thyself to serve Duessa vile, [fil'd?
With whom in all abuse thou hast thyself de-

Is not he just that all this doth behold
From highest heaven, and bears an equal eye?
Shall he thy sins up in his knowledge fold,
And guilty be of thine impiety?

Is not his law, Let every sinner die?
 Die shall all flesh? What then must needs be
 Is it not better to do willingly, [done,
 Than linger till the glass be all out-run? [son.
 Death is the end of woes. Die soon, O Fairy's

The knight was much enmoved with this speech, [pierce,
 That as a sword's point through his heart did
 And in his conscience made a secret breach,
 Well knowing true all that he did rehearse,
 And to his fresh remembrance did reverse
 The ugly view of his deformed crimes,
 That all his manly pow'rs it did disperse,
 As he were charmed with inchaunted rhimes,
 That oftentimes he quak'd, and fainted oftentimes.

In which amazement when the miscreant
 Perceived him to waver weak and frail,
 With trembling horror did his conscience dant,
 And hellish anguish did his soul assail:
 To drive him to despair and quite to quail,
 He shew'd him painted in a table plain,
 The damned ghosts, that do in torments wail,
 And thousand fiends that do them endless pain,
 With fire and brimstone, which for ever shall remain.

The sight whereof so thoroughly him dismay'd,
 That nought but death before his eyes he saw,
 And ever-burning wrath before him laid,
 By righteous sentence of th' Almighty's law:
 Then 'gan the villain him to over-craw,
 And brought unto him swords, ropes, poison,
 fire,

And all that might him to perdition draw;
 And bade him choose what death he would desire: [God's ire.

For death was due to him that had provok'd
 But when as none of them he saw him take,
 He to him raught a dagger sharp and keen,
 And gave it in his hand; his hand did quake,
 And tremble like a leaf of aspin green,
 And troubled blood thro' his pale face was seen
 To come and go; with tidings from the heart,
 As it a running messenger had been:
 At last resolv'd to work his final smart,
 He lifted up his hand, that back again did start.

Which when as Una saw, through every vein
 The crudled cold ran to her well of life,
 As in a swoon: but soon reliev'd again,
 Out of his hand she snatch'd the cursed knife,
 And threw it to the ground, enraged rife,
 And to him said; Fie, fie, faint-hearted knight!
 What meanest thou by this reproachful strife?
 Is this the battle which thou vaunt'st to fight
 With that fire-mouthed dragon, horrible and bright?

Come, come away, frail, silly, fleshy wight,
 Ne let vain words bewitch thy manly heart,
 Ne devilish thoughts dismay thy constant spright:

In heavenly mercies hast thou not a part?
 Why shouldst thou then despair, that chosen art?

Where justice grows, there grows eke greater
 grace,

The which doth quench the brond of hellish
 smart,
 And that accurs'd hand-writing doth deface:
 Arise, sir knight, arise, and leave this cursed
 place.

So up he rose, and thence amounted streight;
 Which when the earl beheld, and saw his guest
 Would safe depart, for all his subtle sleight,
 He chose an halter from among the rest,
 And with it hung himself, unbid, unblest.
 But death he could not work himself thereby;
 For thousand times he so himself had dress'd,
 Yet natheless it could not do him die,
 Till he should die his last, that is eternally.

FAIRFAX's TASSO.

§ 121. Description of the Vision conjured up by Alecto.

A MURDER'D body huge beside him stood,
 Of head and right-hand both but lately spoil'd;
 The left hand bore the head, whose visage
 good
 Both pale and wan, with dust and gore defil'd,
 Yet spake, tho' dead; with those sad words the
 blood
 Forth at his lips in huge abundance boil'd—
 Fly, Argillan, from this false camp fly far,
 Whose guide a traitor, captains murd'ers
 are.

§ 122. Image of Armida and Attendants, en- raged at Rinaldo's hewing down the Myrtle to dissolve the Charm.

HE* lift his brand; nor car'd, though oft she pray'd,
 And she her form to other shape did change;
 Such monsters huge, when men in dreams are laid,
 Oft in their idle fancies roam and range:
 Her body swell'd, her face obscure was made;
 Vanish'd her garments rich, and vestures
 strange;
 A giantess before him high she stands,
 Arm'd, like Briareus, with an hundred
 hands:

With fifty swords, and fifty targets bright,
 She threaten'd death, she roar'd, she cried, and fought:

Each other nymph, in armour likewise dight,
 A Cyclops great became; he fear'd them
 nought,

But on the myrtle smote with all his might,
 Which groan'd, like living souls to death nigh
 brought; [hell,

The sky seem'd Pluto's court, the air seem'd
 Therein such monsters roar, such spirits yell.

Lighten'd the heaven above, the earth below
 Roared aloud: that thunder'd, and this shook!
 Bluster'd the tempests strong: the whirl-winds blow:

The bitter storm drove hail-stones in his look:

* Rinaldo.

But yet his arm grew neither weak nor slow,
Till low to earth the wounded tree down
bended :

Nor of that fury heed or care he took,
Then fled the spirits all, the charms all ended.

§ 123. Description of Armida's wonderful Parrot.

WITH party-colour'd plumes, and purple
-bill,
A wondrous bird among the rest there flew,
That in plain speech sung love-lays loud and shrill ;
Here Leden was like human language true ;
So much she talk'd, and with such wit and skill,
That strange it seemed how much good she knew :

Her feather'd fellows all stood hush to hear ;
Dumb was the wind, the waters silent were.

The gentle budding rose, quoth she, behold,
That first scant peeping forth with virgin beams,

Half ope, half shut, her beauties doth unfold
In its fair leaves, and, less seen, fairer seems,
And after spreads them forth more broad and
bold,

Then languisheth, and dies in last extremes ;
Nor seems the same that decked bed and bow'r
Of many a lady late and paramour.

So in the passing of a day, doth pass
The bud and blossom of the life of man,
Nor e'er doth flourish more ; but, like the grass

Cut down, becometh wither'd, pale, and wan :
Oh, gather then the rose, while time thou hast !
Short is the day, done when it scant began ;

Gather the rose of Love, while yet thou mayst,

Loving be lov'd, embracing be embrac'd.

She ceas'd ; and, as approving all she spoke,
The choir of birds their heavenly tune renew ;
The turtles sigh'd, and sighs with kisses broke ;
The fowls to shades unseed by pairs withdrew :
It seem'd, the laurel chaste, and stubborn oak,
And all the gentle trees on earth that grew,
It seem'd the land, the sea, and heaven above,
All breath'd out fancy sweet, and sigh'd out
love.

GLOVER'S LEONIDAS.

§ 124. Leonidas's Address to his Countrymen.

—HE alone
Remains unshaken. Rising he displays
His godlike presence. Dignity and grace
Adorn his frame, and manly beauty, join'd
With strength Herculean. On his aspect shines
Sublimest virtue, and desire of fame,
Where justice gives the laurel ; in his eye
The inextinguishable spark, which fires
The souls of patriots ; while his brow supports
Undaunted valor, and contempt of death.
Serene he rose, and thus address'd the throng :

Why this astonishment on every face,
Ye men of Sparta ? Does the name of death
Create this fear and wonder ? O my friends !

Why do we labor through the arduous paths
Which lead to virtue ? Fruitless were the toil,
Above the reach of human feet were plac'd
The distant summit, if the fear of death
Could intercept our passage. But in vain
His blackest frowns and terrors he assumes
To shake the firmness of the mind, which knows

That, wanting virtue, life is pain and woe ;
That, wanting liberty, e'en virtue mourns,
And looks around for happiness in vain.
Then speak, O Sparta, and demand my life ;
My heart exulting, answers to thy call,
And smiles on glorious fate. To live with fame
The gods allow to many ! but to die
With equal lustre, is a blessing Heaven
Selects from all the choicest boons of fate,
And with a sparing hand on few bestows.

§ 125. Leonidas's Answer to the Persian Ambassador.

RETURN to Xerxes ; tell him on this rock
The Grecians, faithful to their post, await
His chosen myriads ; tell him, thou hast seen
How far the lust of empire is below
A free-born mind : and tell him, to behold
A tyrant humbled, and by virtuous death
To seal my country's freedom, is a good Surpassing all his boasted pow'r can give.

§ 126. Pathetic Farewell of Leonidas to his Wife and Family.

I SEE, I feel thy anguish, nor my soul
Has ever known the prevalence of love,
E'er prov'd a father's fondness, as this hour ;
Nor, when most ardent to assert my fame,
Was once my heart insensible to thee.
How had it stain'd the honors of my name
To hesitate a moment, and suspend
My country's fate, till shameful life preferr'd
By my inglorious colleague left no choice,
But what in me were infamy to shun,
Not virtue to accept ! Then deem no more
That, of my love regardless, or thy tears,
I haste uncall'd to death. The voice of fate,
The gods, my fame, my country, bid me bleed.
O thou dear mourner ! wherefore streams afresh
That flood of woe ? Why heaves with sighs renew'd

That tender breast ? Leonidas must fall.
Alas ! far heavier misery impends
O'er thee and these, if soften'd by thy tears
I shamefully refuse to yield that breath,
Which justice, glory, liberty, and Heaven
Claim for my country, for my sons, and thee.
Think on my long unalter'd love. Reflect
On my paternal fondness. Has my heart
E'er known a pause of love, or pious care ?
Now shall that care, that tenderness, be prov'd
Most warm and faithful. When thy husband dies

For Lacedæmon's safety, thou wilt share,
Thou and thy children, the diffusive good.

Should I, thus singled from the rest of men ;
Alone intrusted by th' immortal gods
With pow'r to save a people ; should my soul
Desert that sacred cause, thee too I yield
To sorrow and to shame : for thou must weep
With Lacedæmon, must with her sustain
Thy painful portion of oppression's weight.
Thy sons behold now worthy of their names,
And Spartan birth. Their growing bloom must pine

In shame and bondage, and their youthful hearts
Beat at the sound of liberty no more.

On their own virtue and their father's fame
When he the Spartan freedom hath confirm'd,
Before the world illustrious shall they rise,
Their country's bulwark and their mother's joy.

Here paus'd the patriot. With religious awe
Grief heard the voice of virtue. No complaint
The solemn silence broke. Tears ceas'd to flow :

Ceas'd for a moment ; soon again to stream.
For now in arms before the palace rang'd,
His brave companions of the war demand
Their leader's presence ; then her griefs renew'd,

Too great for utterance, intercept her sighs,
And freeze each accent on her falt'ring tongue.
In speechless anguish on the hero's breast
She sinks. On ev'ry side his children press,
Hang on his knees, and kiss his honor'd hand.
His soul no longer struggles to confine
Its strong compunction. Down the hero's cheek,

Down flows the manly sorrow. Great in woe,
Amid his children, who enclose him round,
He stands indulging tenderness and love
In graceful tears, when thus, with lifted eyes,
Address'd to Heaven : Thou ever-living Pow'r,
Look down propitious, sire of gods and men !
And to this faithful woman, whose desert
May claim thy favor, grant the hours of peace.
And thou, my great forefather, son of Jove,
O Hercules, neglect not these thy race !
But since that spirit I from thee derive,
Now bears me from them to resistless fate,
Do thou support their virtue ! Be they taught,
Like thee, with glorious labor life to grace,
And from their father let them learn to die !

§ 127. Characters of Teribazus and Ariana.

AMID the van of Persia was a youth
Nam'd Teribazus, not for golden stores,
Not for wide pastures travers'd o'er with herds,
With bleating thousands, or with bounding steeds.

Nor yet for pow'r, nor splendid honors fam'd.
Rich was his mind in ev'ry art divine,
And through the paths of science had he walk'd
The votary of wisdom. In the years
When tender down invests the ruddy cheek,
He with the Magi turn'd the hallow'd page
Of Zoroaster ; then his tow'ring soul
High on the plumes of contemplation soar'd,
And from the lofty Babylonian fane

With learn'd Chaldeans trac'd the mystic sphere,

There number'd o'er the vivid fires that gleam
Upon the dusky bosom of the night.

Nor on the sands of Ganges were unheard
The Indian sages from sequester'd bow'rs,
While, as attention wonder'd, they disclos'd
The pow'rs of nature ; whether in the woods,
The fruitful glebe or flow'r, or healing plant,
The limpid waters, or the ambient air,
Or in the purer element of fire.

The fertile plains where great Sesostris reign'd,
Mysterious Egypt, next the youth survey'd,
From Elephantis, where impetuous Nile
Precipitates his waters to the sea,
Which far below receives the sevenfold stream.
Thence o'er th' Ionic coast he stray'd : nor pass'd

Miletus by, which once enraptur'd heard
The tongue of Thales ; nor Priene's walls,
Where wisdom dwelt with Bias ; nor the seat
Of Pittacus, along the Lesbian shore.

Here too melodious numbers charm'd his ears,
Which flow'd from Orpheus, and Musæus old,
And thee, O father of immortal verse,
Mæonides, whose strains through every age
Time with his own eternal lips shall sing.

Back to his native Susa then he turn'd
His wand'ring steps. His merit soon was dear
To Hyperanthes, generous and good ;

And Ariana, from Darius sprung
With Hyperanthes, of th' imperial race
Which rul'd th' extent of Asia, in disdain
Of all her greatness, oft an humble ear
To him would bend, and listen to his voice.

Her charms, her mind, her virtue he explor'd
Admiring. Soon was admiration chang'd
To love, nor lov'd he sooner than despair'd.

But unreveal'd and silent was his pain ;
Nor yet in solitary shades he roam'd,
Nor shunn'd resort ; but o'er his sorrows cast
A sickly dawn of gladness, and in smiles
Conceal'd his anguish ; while the secret flame
Rag'd in his bosom, and his peace consum'd.

§ 128. Ariana and Polydorus come by Night into the Grecian Camp.

IN sable pomp, with all her starry train,
The night resum'd her throne. Recall'd from war,

Her long protracted labors Greece forgets,
Dissolv'd in silent slumber ; all but those,
Who watch'd th' uncertain perils of the dark,
An hundred warriors : Agis was their chief.

High on the wall intent the hero sat,
As o'er the surface of the tranquil main
Along its undulating breast the wind
The various din of Asia's host convey'd,
In one deep murmur swelling in his ear :
When, by the sound of footsteps down the pass

Alarm'd, he calls aloud : What feet are those,
Which bear the echoing pavement of the rock ?
With speed reply, nor tempt your instant fate.
He said : and thus return'd a voice unknown :

Not with the feet of enemies we come,
But crave admittance with a friendly tongue.
The Spartan answers: Thro' the midnight shade [broad?

What purpose draws your wand'ring steps a-
To whom the stranger. We are friends to Greece,

And to the presence of the Spartan king
Admission we implore. The cautious chief
Of Lacedæmon hesitates again:

When thus, with accents musically sweet,
A tender voice his wond'ring ear allur'd:

O gen'rous Grecian, listen to the pray'r
Of one distress'd! whom grief alone hath led
In this dark hour to these victorious tents,
A wretched woman, innocent of fraud.

The Greek descending thro' th' unfolded gates
Upheld a flaming brand. One first appear'd
In servile garb attir'd; but near his side
A woman graceful and majestic stood;
Not with an aspect rivalling the pow'r
Of fatal Helen, or the wanton charms
Of love's soft queen; but such as far excell'd
Whate'er the lily blending with the rose
Paints on the cheek of beauty, soon to fade;
Such as express'd a mind which wisdom rul'd,
And sweetness temper'd, virtue's purest light
Illumining the countenance divine;
Yet could not soothe remorseless fate, nor teach

Malignant fortune to revere the good;
Which oft with anguish rends the spotless
heart,

And oft associates wisdom with despair.
In courteous phrase began the chief humane:

Exalted fair, who thus adorn'st the night,
Forbear to blame the vigilance of war,
And to the laws of rigid Mars impute
That I thus long unwilling have delay'd
Before the great Leonidas to place
This your apparent dignity and worth.

He spake; and gently to the lofty tent
Of Sparta's king the lovely stranger guides.
At Agis' summons, with a mantle broad
His mighty limbs Leonidas infolds,
And quits his couch. In wonder he surveys
Th' illustrious virgin, whom his presence
aw'd:

Her eye submissive to the ground inclin'd
With veneration of the god-like man.
But soon his voice her anxious dread dispell'd,

Benevolent and hospitable thus:

Thy form alone, thus amiable and great,
Thy mind delineates, and from all commands
Supreme regard. Relate, thou noble dame,
By what relentless destiny compell'd,
Thy tender feet the paths of darkness tread:
Rehearse th' afflictions whence thy virtue mourns.

On her wan cheek a sudden blush arose,
Like day's first dawn upon the twilight pale,
And, wrapt in grief, these words a passage broke:

If to be most unhappy, and to know
That hope is irrecoverably fled;
If to be great and wretched, may deserve

Commiseration from the good, behold,
Thou glorious leader of unconquer'd bands,
Behold, descended from Darius' loins,
Th' afflicted Ariana; and my pray'r
Accept with pity, nor my tears disdain!
First, that I lov'd the best of human race,
By nature's hand with ev'ry virtue form'd,
Heroic, wise, adorn'd with ev'ry art,
Of shame unconscious does my heart reveal.
This day in Grecian arms conspicuous clad
He fought, he fell! A passion long conceal'd
For me, alas! within my brother's arms
His dying breath resigning, he disclos'd.

—Oh I will stay my sorrows!—will forbid
My eyes to stream before thee, and my heart,
Thus full of anguish, will from sighs restrain!
For why should thy humanity be griev'd
With my distress, and learn from me to mourn
The lot of nature, doom'd to care and pain!
Hear then, O king, and grant my sole request,
To seek his body in the heaps of slain.

Thus to the Spartan sued the regal maid,
Resembling Ceres in majestic woe,
When suppliant at Jove's resplendent throne,
From dreary Pluto, and th' infernal gloom,
Her lov'd and lost Proserpina she sought.
Fix'd on the weeping queen with steadfast
eyes,

Laconia's chief these tender thoughts recall'd:
Such are thy sorrows, O for ever dear!

Who now at Lacedæmon dost deplore
My everlasting absence!—then inclin'd
His head, and sigh'd; nor yet forgot to charge
His friend, the gentle Agis, through the straits
The Persian princess to attend and aid.
With careful steps they seek her lover's corse.
The Greeks remember'd, where by fate re-
press'd

His arm first ceas'd to mow their legions down:
And from beneath a mass of Persian slain
Soon drew the hero, by his armor known.
To Agis' high pavilion they resort.

Now, Ariana, what transcending pangs Thy soul involv'd! what horror clasp'd thy heart!

Bat love grew mightiest; and her beauteous limbs

On the cold breast of Teribazus, threw
The grief-distracted maid. The clotted gore
Deform'd her snowy bosom. O'er his wounds Loose flow'd her hair, and bubbling from her eyes

Impetuous sorrow lav'd the purple clay,
When forth in groans her lamentations broke:

O torn for ever from my weeping eyes!
Thou, who despairing to obtain her heart,
Who then most lov'd thee, didst untimely yield

Thy life to fate's inevitable dart
For her who now in agony unfolds
Her tender bosom, and repeats her vows
To thy deaf ear, who fondly to her own
Now clasps thy breast insensible and cold.
Alas! do those unmoving ghastly orbs Perceive my gushing anguish? Does that heart,

Which death's inanimating hand hath chill'd,

Share in my suff'rings, and return my sighs?
 —O bitter unsurmountable distress!
 Lo! on thy breast is Ariana bow'd,
 Hangs o'er thy face, unites her cheek to thine,
 Not now to listen with enchanted ears
 To thy persuasive eloquence, no more Charm'd with the wisdom of thy copious
 mind!

She could no more: invincible despair
 Suppress'd her utterance. As a marble form
 Fix'd on the solemn sepulchre, unmov'd,
 O'er some dead hero, whom his country lov'd,
 Bends down the head with imitated woe;
 So paus'd the princess o'er the breathless clay,
 Intransigent in sorrow. On the dreary wound,
 Where Dithyrambus's sword was deepest plung'd,
 Mute for a space and motionless she gaz'd;
 Then with a look unchang'd, nor trembling
 hand,
 Drew forth a poniard, with her garment veil'd,
 And, sheathing in her heart th' abhorred steel,
 On her slain lover silent sinks in death.

§ 129. The History of Porsenna, King of Russia. LISLE.

IN Russia's frozen clime, some ages since,
 There dwelt, historians say, a worthy prince,
 Who to his people's good confin'd his care,
 And fix'd the basis of his empire there;
 Enlarg'd their trade, the liberal arts improv'd,
 Made nations happy and himself belov'd;
 To all the neighbouring states a terror grown,
 The dear delight and glory of his own.
 Not like those kings who vainly seek renown
 From countries ruin'd, and from battles won;
 Those mighty Nimrods, who mean laws despise,
 Call murder but a princely exercise;
 And if one bloodless sun should steal away,
 Cry out with Titus they have lost a day.
 Who to be more than men, themselves debase
 Beneath the brute, their Maker's form deface,
 Raising their titles by their God's disgrace.
 Like fame to bold Erostratus we give,
 Who scorn'd by less than sacrilege to live;
 On holy ruins rais'd a lasting name,
 And in the temple's fire diffus'd his shame.
 Far different praises and a brighter fame,
 The virtues of the young Porsenna claim;
 For by that name the Russian king was known,
 And sure a nobler ne'er adorn'd a throne:
 In war he knew the deathful sword to wield,
 And sought the thickest dangers of the field;
 A bold commander, but the storm o'erflown,
 He seem'd as he were made for peace alone;
 Then was the golden age again restor'd,
 Nor less his justice honor'd than his sword.
 All needless pomp, and outward grandeur spar'd,
 The deeds that grac'd him were his only guard.
 No private views beneath a borrow'd name,
 His and the public interest were the same.
 In wealth and pleasure let the subject live,
 But virtue is the king's prerogative.

Porsenna there without a rival stood,
 And would maintain his right of doing good.
 Nor did his person less attraction wear,
 Such majesty and sweetness mingled there;
 Heaven with uncommon art the clay refin'd,
 A proper mansion for so fair a mind;
 Each look, each action, bore peculiar grace,
 And love itself was painted on his face.
 In peaceful time he suffer'd not his mind
 To rust in sloth, tho' much to peace inclin'd;
 Nor wanton in the lap of pleasure lay,
 And lost to glory loiter'd life away;
 But active rising ere the prime of day,
 Thro' woods and lonely deserts lov'd to stray;
 With hounds and horns to wake the furious
 bear,

Or rouse the tawny lion from his lair;
 To rid the forest of the savage brood,
 And whet his courage for his country's good.

One day, as he pursu'd the dangerous sport,
 Attended by the nobles of his court,
 It chanc'd a beast of more than common speed
 Sprang from the brake, and thro' the forest fled.
 The ardent prince impetuous as the wind
 Rush'd on, and left his lagging train behind:
 Fir'd with the chace, and full of youthful blood,

[rode,
 O'er plains and vales, and woodland wilds he
 Urging his courser's speed, nor thought the day
 Now wasted, nor how intricate the way;
 Nor till the night in dusky clouds came on,
 Restrain'd his pace, or found himself alone.
 Missing his train, he strove to measure back,
 The road he came, but could not find the track;

Still turning to the place he left before,
 And only lab'ring to be lost the more,
 The bugle-horn, which o'er his shoulders hung,
 So loud he winded, that the forest rung;
 In vain, no voice but echo from the ground,
 And vocal woods made mock'ry of the sound.

And now the gath'ring clouds began to spread
 O'er the dun face of night a deeper shade,
 And the hoarse thunder growling from afar,
 With herald voice proclaim'd th' approaching
 war;

Silence a while ensued,—then by degrees
 A hollow wind came mutt'ring thro' the trees.
 Sudden the full-fraught sky discharg'd its store
 Of rain and rattling hail a mingled shower;
 The active lightning ran along the ground,
 The fiery bolts by fits were hurl'd around,
 And the wide forests trembled at the sound.
 Amazement seiz'd the prince, where could he fly,

No guide to lead, no friendly cottage nigh?
 Pensive and unresolv'd a while he stood,
 Beneath the scanty covert of the wood;
 But drove from hence, soon sallied forth again
 As chance directed on the dreary plain;
 Constrain'd his melancholy way to take
 Thro' many a loathsome bog, and thorny brake,
 Caught in the thicket, flound'ring in the lake,
 Wet with the storm, and wearied with the
 way,
 By hunger pinch'd, himself to beasts a prey;

Nor wine to cheer his heart, nor fire to burn,
Nor place to rest, nor prospect to return;
Drooping and spiritless, at life's despair,
He bade it pass, not worth his farther care;
When suddenly he spied a distant light,
That faintly twinkled thro' the gloom of night,
And his heart leapt for joy, and bless'd the welcome sight,

Oft times he doubted, it appear'd so far,
And hung so high, 'twas nothing but a star,
Or kindling vapor wand'ring through the sky;
But still press'd on his steed, still kept it in his
eye;

Till much fatigue and many dangers past,
At a huge mountain he arriv'd at last.
There lighting from his horse, on hands and knees

Grop'd out the darksome road by slow degrees,
Crawling or clamb'ring o'er the rugged way,
The thunder rolls above, the flames around him play.

Joyful at length he gain'd the steepy height,
And found the rift whence sprang the friendly
light;

And here he stopp'd to rest his wearied feet,
And weigh the perils he had still to meet;
Unsheath'd his trusty sword, and dealt his eyes
With caution round him, to prevent surprise;
Then summon'd all the forces of his mind,
And ent'ring boldly cast his fears behind:
Resolv'd to push his way, whate'er withstood,
Or bravely perish as a monarch should.

While he the wonders of the place survey'd,
And through the various cells at random stray'd,
In a dark corner of the cave he view'd
Somewhat that in the shape of woman stood;
But more deform'd, than dreams can represent
The midnight hag, or poet's fancy paint
The Lapland witch, when she her broom be-strides,

And scatters storms and tempests as she rides.
She look'd as nature made her to disgrace
Her kind, and cast a blot on all the race;
Her shrivel'd skin with yellow spots besmear'd Like mouldy records seem'd, her eyes were blear'd;

Her feeble limbs with age and palsy shook,
Bent was her body, haggard was her look.
From the dark nook outcrept the filthy crone,
And propt upon her crutch, came tott'ring on.

The prince in civil guise approach'd the
dame,

Told her his piteous case, and whence he came,
And till Aurora should the shades expel,
Implor'd a lodging in her friendly cell.

Mortal, whoe'er thou art, the fiend began,
And as she spake a deadly horror ran Thro' all his frame; his cheeks the blood forsook,

Chatter'd his teeth, his knees together shook:
Whoe'er thou art, that with presumption rude
Dar'st on our sacred privacy intrude,
And without licence in our court appear,
Know, thou'rt the first that ever enter'd here:
But since thou plead'st excuse, thou'rt hither brought

More by thy fortune than thy own default;

Thy crime, tho' great, an easy pardon finds,
For mercy ever dwells in royal minds.
And would you learn from whose indulgent
hand

You live, and in whose awful presence stand;
Know farther, thro' yon wide extended plains,
Great Eolus, the king of tempests, reigns,
And in this lofty palace makes abode,
Well suited to his state, and worthy of the god.
The various elements his empire own,
And pay their humble homage at his throne;
And hither all the storms and clouds resort,
Proud to increase the splendor of his court.

His queen am I, from whom the beauteous race
Of Winds arose, sweet fruit of our embrace!
She scarce had ended, when with wild uproar,
And horrid din, her sons impetuous pour
Around the cave; came rushing in amain,
Lybs, Eurus, Boreas, all the boist'rous train;
And close behind them on a whirlwind rode
In clouded majesty the blust'ring god.

Their locks a thousand ways were blown about,
Their cheeks, like full-blown bladders, strutted out;

Their boasting talk was of the feats th' had
Of trees uprooted, and of towns o'erthrown;
And when they kindly turn'd them to accost
The prince, they almost pierc'd him with their frost.

The gaping hag in fix'd attention stood,
And at the close of every tale cried—Good!
Blessing, with outstretch'd arms, each darling son,

In due proportion to the mischief done.
And where, says she, does little Zephyr stray?
Know ye, my sons, your brother's route to day;
In what bold deeds does he his hours employ?
Grant heaven no evil has befall'n my boy;
Ne'er was he known to linger thus before.
Scarce had she spoke, when at the cavern door
Came lightly tripping, in a form more fair
Than the young poet's fond ideas are,
When, fir'd with love, he tries his utmost art
To paint the beauteous tyrant of his heart.
A satin vest his slender shape confin'd,
Embroider'd o'er with flowers of every kind,
Flora's own work, when first the goddess
strove

To win the little wanderer to her love.
Of burnish'd silver were his sandals made,
Silver his buskins, and with gems o'erlaid;
A saffron-color'd robe behind him flow'd,
And added grace and grandeur as he trod,
His wings than lilies whiter to behold,
Sprinkled with azure spots, and streak'd with
gold;

So thin their form, and of so light a kind,
That they for ever danc'd, and flutter'd in the wind.

Around his temples, with becoming air,
In wanton ringlets curl'd his auburn hair,
And o'er his shoulders negligently spread,
A wreath of fragrant roses crown'd his head.

Such his attire, but O! no pen can trace,
No words can show the beauties of his face;
So kind! so winning! so divinely fair,
Eternal youth and pleasure flourish there;

There all the little loves and graces meet,
And every thing that's soft, and every thing
that's sweet.

Thou vagrant, cried the dame, in angry tone,
Where couldst thou loiter thus, so long alone?
Little thou car'st what anxious thoughts molest,
What pangs are laboring in a mother's breast;
Well do you show your duty by your haste,
For thou of all my sons art always last.
A child less fondled would have fled more fast.
Sure 'tis a curse on mothers, doom'd to mourn,
Where best they love, the least and worst return.

My dear mamma, the gentle youth reply'd,
And made a low obeisance, cease to chide;
Nor wound me with your words, for well you
know

Your Zephyr bears a part in all your woe.
How great must be his sorrow then to learn
That he himself's the cause of your concern!
Nor had I loiter'd thus, had I been free,
But the fair Princess of Felicity
Entreated me to make some short delay,
And ask'd by her, could I refuse to stay?
Surrounded by the damsels of her court,
She sought the shady grove, her lov'd resort;
Fresh rose the grass, the flowers were mix'd between

Like rich embroidery on a ground of green;
And in the midst, protected by the shade,
A crystal stream in wild meanders play'd;
While in its banks, the trembling leaves among,

A thousand little birds in concert sung:
Close by a mount with fragrant shrubs o'er-
grown,

On a cool mossy couch she laid her down;
Her air, her posture, all conspir'd to please,
Her head upon her snowy arm at ease
Reclin'd, a studied carelessness express'd;
Loose lay her robe, and naked heav'd her breast.

Eager I flew to that delightful place,
And pour'd a shower of kisses on her face;
Now hover'd o'er her neck, her breast, her arms,
Like bees o'er flowers, and tasted all their charms:

And then her lips, and then her cheeks I tried,
And fann'd, and wanton'd round on ev'ry side.

O Zephyr! cried the fair, thou charming boy,
Thy presence only can create me joy;
To me thou art beyond expression dear,
Nor can I quit the place while thou art
here.

Excuse my weakness, madam, when I swear
Such gentle words, join'd with so soft an air,
Pronounc'd so sweetly from a mouth so fair,
Quite ravish'd all my sense, nor did I know
How long I stay'd, or when, or where to go.

Meanwhile the damsels, debonair and gay,
Prattled around, and laugh'd the time away:
These in soft notes address'd the ravish'd ear,
And warbled out so sweet, 'twas heaven to hear;
And those in rings, beneath the green-wood
shade,

Danc'd to the melody their fellows made;

Some, studious of themselves, employ'd their care

In weaving flowery wreaths to deck their hair;
While others to some fav'rite plant convey'd Refreshing show'rs, and cheer'd its drooping
head:

A joy so general spread through all the place,
Such satisfaction dwelt on every face,
The nymphs so kind, so lovely look'd the queen,
That never eye beheld a sweeter scene.

Porsenna like a statue fix'd appear'd,
And wrapt in silent wonder, gaz'd and heard.
Much he admir'd the speech, the speaker more,
And dwelt on every word, and griev'd to find it
o'er.

O gentle youth, he cried, proceed to tell
In what fair country does this princess dwell;
What regions unexplor'd, what hidden coast,
Can so much goodness, so much beauty boast?
To whom the winged god, with gracious look,
Numberless sweets diffusing while he spoke,
Thus answer'd kind: These happy gardens lie
Far hence remov'd, beneath a milder sky;
Their name—the Kingdom of Felicity.

Sweet scenes of endless bliss, enchanted ground,
A soil for ever sought, but seldom found;
Though in the search all human kind in vain
Weary their wits, and waste their lives in pain;
In different parties, different paths they tread,
As reason guides them, or as follies lead; [see,
These wrangling for the place they ne'er shall Debating those, if such a place there be;

But not the wisest or the best can say
Where lies the point, or mark the certain way.

Some few, by Fortune favor'd, for her sport,
Have sail'd in sight of this delightful port;
In thought already seiz'd the bless'd abodes,
And in their fond delirium rank'd with gods.
Fruitless attempt! all avenues are kept
By dreadful foes, sentry that never slept.
Here fell Detraction darts her pois'nous breath,
Fraught with a thousand stings, and scatters
death;

Short-sighted Envy there maintains her post,
And shakes her flaming brand, and stalks
around the coast;

These on the helpless crowd their fury pour,
Plunge in the waves, or dash against the shore, Teach wretched mortals they were doom'd to mourn,

And ne'er must rest but in the silent urn. [bear,
But say, young monarch; for what name you
Your mien, your dress, your person all declare,
And though I seldom fan the frozen north,
Yet have I heard of brave Porsenna's worth;
My brother Boreas thro' the world has flown,
Swelling his breath to spread forth your renown;

Say, would you choose to visit this retreat,
And view the world where all these wonders
meet?

Wish you some friend o'er the tempestuous sea
To bear you safe? behold that friend in me.
My active wings shall all their force employ,
And nimbly waft you to the realms of joy;
As once, to gratify the god of love,
I bore fair Psyche to the Cyprian grove;

Or as Jove's bird, descending from on high, Snatch'd the young Trojan trembling to the sky;
There perfect bliss thou mayst for ever share,
'Scap'd from the busy world, and all its care;
There in the lovely princess thou wilt find
A mistress ever blooming, ever kind.
All ecstasy, on air Porsenna trod,
And to his bosom strain'd the little god;
With grateful sentiments his heart o'erflow'd,
And in the warmest words, millions of thanks
bestow'd.

When Eolus in surly humor broke
Their strict embrace, and thus abruptly spoke:
Enough of compliment, I hate the sport
Of meanless words: this is no human court;
Where plain and honest are discarded quite,
For the more modish title of polite;
Where in soft speeches hypocrites impart
The venom'd ills that lurk beneath the heart;
In friendship's holy guise their guilt improve,
And kindly kill with specious show of love.
For us—my subjects are not us'd to wait,
And waste their hours to hear a mortal prate;
They must abroad before the rising sun,
And hie 'em to the seas: there's mischief to be done.

Excuse my plainness, sir, but business stands,
And we have storms and shipwrecks on our hands.

He ended frowning, and the noisy rout
Each to his several cell went passing out;
But Zephyr, far more courteous than the rest,
To his own bower convey'd the royal guest;
There on a bed of roses neatly laid,
Beneath the fragrance of a myrtle shade,
His limbs to needful rest the prince applied,
His sweet companion slumb'ring by his side.

BOOK II.

No sooner in her silver chariot rose
The ruddy Morn, than, sated with repose,
The prince address'd his host; the god awoke,
And leaping from his couch, thus kindly spoke:
This early call, my lord, that chides my stay
Requires my thanks, and I with joy obey;
Like you I long to reach the blissful coast,
Hate the slow night, and mourn the moments lost.

The bright Rosinda, loveliest of the fair
That crowd the princess' court, demands my care,

E'en now with fears and jealousies o'erborn,
Upbraids and call me cruel and forsworn;
What sweet rewards on all my toils attend,
Serving at once my mistress and my friend!
Just to my love and to my duty too,
Well paid in her, well pleas'd in pleasing you.
This said, he led him to the cavern gate,
And clasp'd him in his arms, and pois'd his weight:

Then balancing his body here and there,
Stretch'd forth his agile wings, and launch'd
in air;

Swift as the fiery meteor from on high
Shoots to its goal, and gleams athwart the sky.

Here with quick fan his lab'ring pinions play,
There glide at ease along the liquid way;
Now lightly skim the plain with even flight,
Now proudly soar above the mountain's height.
Spiteful Detraction, whose envenom'd hate Sports with the suffering of the good and great,

Spares not our prince, but with opprobrious sneer

Arraigns him of the heinous sin of fear;
That he, so tried in arms, whose very name
Infus'd a secret panic where it came;
E'en he, as high above the clouds he flew,
And spied the mountain less'ning to the view;
Nought round him but the wide expanded
air,

Helpless, abandon'd to a stripling's care;
Struck with the rapid whirl, and dreadful height,

Confess'd some faint alarm, some little fright.

The friendly god, who instantly divin'd
The terrors that possess'd his fellow's mind,
To calm his troubled thoughts, and cheat the
way,

Describ'd the nations that beneath them lay;
The name, the climate, and the soil's increase,
Their arms in war, their government in peace;
Show'd their domestic arts, their foreign trade,
What int'rest they pursu'd, what leagues they made.

The sweet discourse so charm'd Porsenna's ear,
That, lost in joy, he had no time for fear.
From Scandinavia's cold inclement waste,
O'er wide Germania's various realms they past;

And now on Albion's fields suspend their toil,
And hover for a while, and bless the soil.

O'er the gay scene the prince delighted hung,
And gaz'd in rapture, and forgot his tongue;
Till bursting forth at length, Behold, cried he,
The promis'd isle, the land I long'd to see;
Those plains, those vales, and fruitful hills declare

My queen, my charmer must inhabit there.
Thus rav'd the monarch, and the gentle guide,
Pleas'd with his error, thus in smiles replied:
I must applaud, my lord, the lucky thought,
E'en I, who know th' original, am caught,
And doubt my senses, when I view the draught,
The slow-ascending hill, the lofty wood
That mantles o'er its brow; the silver flood,
Wand'ring in mazes through the flow'ry mead;
The herd that in the plenteous pastures feed;
And every object, every scene excites
Fresh wonder in my soul, and fills with new delights:

Dwells cheerful Plenty there, and learned Ease,
And art with nature seems at strife to please,
There Liberty, delightful goddess, reigns,
Gladdens each heart, and gilds the fertile plains;

There firmly seated may she ever smile,
And show'r her blessings o'er her fav'rite isle.
But see, the rising sun reproves our stay,
He said, and to the ocean wing'd his way;
Stretching his course to climates then unknown,
Nations that swelter in the burning zone;

There in Peruvian vales a moment staid,
And smooth'd his wings beneath the citron
shade.

Then swift his oary pinions plied again,
Cross'd the new world, and sought the southern
main;

Where many a wet and weary league o'erpast,
The wish-for paradise appear'd at last.

With force abated, now they gently sweep
O'er the smooth surface of the shining deep;
The Dryads hail'd them from the distant shore,
The Nereids play'd around, the Tritons swam
before;

While soft Favonius their arrival greets,
And breathes his welcome in a thousand sweets.
Nor pale Disease, nor health-consuming Care,
Nor Wrath, nor foul Revenge, can enter there:
No vapor's foggy gloom imbrowns the sky,
No tempests rage, no angry lightnings fly;
But dews and soft refreshing airs are found,
And pure ethereal azure shines around.

Whate'er the sweet Sabæan Isle can boast,
Or Mecca's plains, or India's spicy coast;
What Hybla hills, or rich Cæbalia's fields,
Or flow'ry vale of fam'd Hymettus yields;
Or what of old th' Hesperian orchard grac'd,
All that was e'er delicious to the taste,
Sweet to the smell, or lovely to the view,
Collected there, with added beauty grew.

High-tow'ring to the heavens, the trees are seen,
Their bulk immense, their leaf for ever green;
So closely interwove, the tell-tale sun
Can ne'er descry the deeds beneath them done,
But where by fits the sportive gales divide
Their tender tops, and fan the leaves aside.
Like a smooth carpet at their feet lies spread
The matted grass, by bubbling fountains fed;
And on each bough the feather'd choir employ
Their melting notes, and nought is heard but joy.

The painted flow'rs exhale a rich perfume,
The fruits are mingled with eternal bloom;
And Spring and Autumn hand in hand appear,
Lead on the merry months, and join to clothe
the year. [pour'd,

Here, o'er the mountain's shaggy summits
From rock to rock the tumbling torrent roar'd;
While beauteous Iris, in the vale below,
Paints on the rising fumes her radiant bow:
Now thro' the meads the mazy current stray'd,
Now hid its wand'rings in the myrtle shade;
Or in a thousand veins divides its store,
Visits each plant, refreshes every flow'r;
O'er gems and golden sands in murmurs flows,
And sweetly soothes the soul, and lulls to soft repose.

If hunger call, no sooner can the mind
Express her will to needful food inclin'd,
But in some cool recess, or op'ning glade,
The seats are plac'd, the tables neatly laid,
And instantly convey'd by magic hand,
In comely rows the costly dishes stand;
Meats of all kinds that nature can impart,
Prepar'd in all the nicest forms of art.
A troop of sprightly nymphs array'd in green,
With flow'ry chaplets crown'd, come scudding in.

With fragrant blossoms these adorn the breast
Those with officious zeal attend the guest;
Beneath his feet the silken carpet spread,
Or sprinkle liquid odors o'er his head.

Others in ruby cups, with roses bound
Delightful! deal the sparkling nectar round;
Or weave the dance, or tune the vocal lay;
The lyres resound, the merry minstrels play:
Gay health, and youthful joys o'erspread the place, [face.

And swell each heart, and triumph in each
So when embolden'd by the vernal air,
The busy bees to blooming fields repair;
For various use employ their chymic pow'r;
One culls the snowy pounce, one sucks the flow'r:

Again to different works returning home,
Some steeve the honey, some erect the comb;
All for the general good in concert strive,
And every soul's in motion, every limb's alive.

And now descending from his flight, the god
On the green turf releas'd his precious load;
There, after mutual salutations past,
And endless friendship vow'd, they part in haste;

Zephyr impatient to behold his love, [grove,
The prince in raptures wand'ring through the
Now skipping on, and singing as he went,
Now stopping short, to give his transports vent,
With sudden gusts of happiness oppress'd,
Or stands intranc'd, or raves like one possess'd;
His mind afloat, his wand'ring senses quite O'ercome with charms, and frantic with de-
light;

From scene to scene by random steps convey'd,
Admires the distant views, explores the secret
shade,

Dwells on each spot, with eager eye devours
The woods, the lawns, the buildings, and the bow'rs;

New sweets, new joys at ev'ry glance arise,
And every turn creates a fresh surprise.
Close by the borders of a rising wood,
In a green vale a crystal grotto stood,
And o'er its sides, beneath a beechen shade,
In broken falls a silver fountain play'd.
Hither, attracted by the murmuring stream,
And cool recess, the pleas'd Porsenna came,
And on the tender grass reclining chose
To wave his joys a while, and take a short repose.

The scene invites him, and the wanton breeze
That whispers thro' the vale, the dancing trees,
The warbling birds, and rills that gently creep,
All join their music to prolong his sleep.

The princess to her morning walk prepar'd;
The female troops attend, a beauteous guard.
Array'd in all her charms appear'd the fair;
Tall was her stature, unconfin'd her air;
Proportion deck'd her limbs, and in her face
Lay love enshrin'd, lay sweet attractive grace,
Temp'ring the awful beams her eyes convey'd
And like a lambent flame around her play'd.
No foreign aids, by mortal ladies worn,
From shells and rocks her artless charms adorn
For grant that beauty were by gems increas'd,
'Tis render'd more suspected at the least;

And foul defects, that would escape the sight,
Start from the piece, and take a stronger light.
Her chesnut hair in careless rings around
Her temples wav'd, with pinks and jes'mine
crown'd,

And gather'd in a silken cord behind,
Curl'd to the waist, and floated in the wind;
O'er these a veil of yellow gauze she wore,
With emeralds and gold embroider'd o'er.
Her snowy neck half naked to the view
Gracefully fell; a robe of purple hue
Hung loosely o'er her slender shape, and tried
To shade those beauties, that it could not hide.

The damsels of her train with mirth and song
Frolic behind, and laugh and sport along.
The birds proclaim their queen from every tree,
The beasts run frisking through the groves to see;
The loves, the pleasures, and the graces meet
In antic rounds, and dance before her feet.
By whate'er fancy led, it chanc'd that day
They through the secret valley took their way,
And to the crystal grot advancing, spied
The prince extended by the fountain's side.
He look'd as by some skilful hand express'd
Apollo's youthful form retir'd to rest, [wood
When with the chase fatigu'd he quits the
For Pindus' vale, and Aganippe's flood;
There sleeps secure, his careless limbs display'd
At ease, encircled by the laurel shade;
Beneath his head his sheaf of arrows lie,
His bow unbent, hangs negligently by:
The slumb'ring prince might boast an equal
grace,

So turn'd his limbs, so beautiful his face.
Waking he started from the ground in haste,
And saw the beauteous choir around him plac'd;
Then summoning his senses, ran to meet
The queen, and laid him humbly at her feet.
Deign, lovely princess, to behold, said he,
One who has travell'd all the world to see
Those charms, and worship thy divinity;
Accept thy slave, and with a gracious smile,
Excuse his rashness, and reward his toil.
Stood motionless the fair, with mute surprise,
And read him over with admiring eyes;
And while she gaz'd, a pleasing smart
Ran thrilling through her veins and reach'd her heart.

Each limb she scann'd, consider'd every grace,
And sagely judg'd him of the phoenix race.
An animal like this she ne'er had known,
And thence concluded there could be but one;
The creature too had all the phoenix air,
None but the phoenix could appear so fair.
The more she look'd, the more she thought it
true,

And call'd him by that name, to show she knew.
O handsome phoenix, for that such you are
We know; your beauty does your breed declare;
And I with sorrow own through all my coast
No other bird can such perfection boast;
For nature form'd you single and alone;
Alas! what pity 'tis there is but one!
Were there a queen so fortunate to shew
An aviary of charming birds like you,
What envy would her happiness create
In all who saw the glories of her state!

The prince laugh'd inwardly, surpris'd to
find

So strange a speech, so innocent a mind.
The compliment indeed did some offence
To reason, and a little wrong'd her sense;
He could not let it pass, but told his name,
And what he was, and whence, and why he
came,

And hinted other things of high concern
For him to mention, and for her to learn;
And she'd a piercing wit, of wondrous reach
To comprehend whatever he could teach.
Thus hand in hand they to the palace walk,
Pleas'd and instructed with each other's talk.
Here should I tell the furniture's expense,
And all the structure's vast magnificence,
Describe the walls of shining sapphire made,
With emeralds and pearl the floors inlaid,
And how the vaunted canopies unfold
A mimic heaven, and flame with gems and
gold;

Or how Felicity regales her guest,
The wit, the mirth, the music, and the feast;
And on each part bestow the praises due,
'Twould tire the writer, and the reader too.
My amorous tale a softer path pursues;
Love and the happy pair demand my muse.

O could her art in equal terms express
The lives they lead, the pleasures they possess!
Fortune had ne'er so plenteously before
Bestow'd her gifts, nor can she lavish more.
'Tis heaven itself, 'tis ecstasy of bliss,
Uninterrupted joy, untir'd excess!
Mirth following mirth, the moments dance
away!

Love claims the night, and Friendship rules the day.

Their tender care no cold indifference knows;
No jealousies disturb their sweet repose;
No sickness, no decay; but youthful grace
And constant beauty shines in either face.
Benumbing age may mortal charms invade,
Flow'rs of a day that do but bloom and fade;
Far different here, on them it only blows
The lily's white, and spreads the blushing rose.

No conquest o'er those radiant eyes can boast,
They, like the stars, shine brighter in its
frost;

Nor fear its rigor, nor its rule obey;
All seasons are the same, and ev'ry month is
May.

Alas! how vain is happiness below!
Man soon or late must have his share of woe:
Slight are his joys, and fleeting as the wind;
His griefs wound home, and leave a sting behind;

His lot distinguish'd from the brute appears
Less certain by his laughter than his tears;
For ignorance too oft our pleasure breeds,
But sorrow from the reasoning soul proceeds.

If man on earth in endless bliss could be,
The boon, young prince, had been bestow'd on thee;

Bright shone thy stars, thy fortune flourish'd fair,
And seem'd secure beyond the reach of care;

And so might still have been, but anxious thought
Has dash'd thy cup, and thou must taste the draught.

It so befel, as on a certain day
This happy couple toy'd their time away,
He ask'd how many charming hours had flown
Since on her slave her heaven of beauty shone.
Should I consult my heart, cried he, the rate
Were small, a week would be the utmost date:
But when my mind reflects on actions past,
And counts its joys, time must have fled more fast.

Perhaps I might have said three months are gone.

Three months! replied the fair, three months
alone?

Know that three hundred years have roll'd away,
Since at my feet the lovely phoenix lay.

Three hundred years! re-echo'd back the prince,
A whole three hundred years completed since
I landed here! O! whither then are flown
My dearest friends, my subjects, and my throne?
How strange, alas! how alter'd shall I find
Each earthly thing, each scene I left behind!
Who knows me now? on whom shall I depend?
To gain my rights, where shall I find a friend?
My crown perhaps may grace a foreign line,
A race of kings that know not me or mine;
Who reigns may wish my death, his subjects treat

My claims with scorn, and call their prince a cheat.

O had my life been ended as begun!
My destin'd stage, my race of glory run,
I should have died well pleas'd, my honor'd name
Had liv'd, had flourish'd in the list of fame.
Reflecting now, my mind with horror sees
The sad survey, a scene of shameful ease,
The odious blot, the scandal of my race
Scarce known, and only mention'd with disgrace.

The fair beheld him with impatient eye,
And red with anger made this warm reply—
Ungrateful man! is this the kind return
My love deserves? and can you thus with scorn
Reject what once you priz'd; what once you swore

Surpass'd all charms, and made e'en glory poor?
What gifts have I bestow'd, what favors shown!
Made you partaker of my bed and throue;
Three centuries preserv'd in youthful prime,
Safe from the rage of death, and injuries of
time:

Weak arguments! for glory reigns above
The feeble ties of gratitude and love.
I urge them not, nor would request your stay,
The phantom glory calls, and I obey;
All other virtues are regardless quite,
Sunk and absorb'd in that superior light.
Go then, barbarian, to thy realms return;
And show thyself unworthy my concern;
Go tell the world, your tender heart could give
Death to the princess by whose care you live.

At this a deadly pale her cheeks o'erspread,
Cold trembling seiz'd her limbs, her spirits fled;

She sunk into his arms: the prince was mov'd,
Felt all her griefs, for still he greatly lov'd.
He sigh'd, he wish'd he could forget his throne,
Confine his thoughts, and live for her alone;
But glory shot him deep, the venom'd dart
Was fix'd within, and rankled at his heart;
He could not hide his wounds, but pin'd away
Like a sick flow'r, and languish'd in decay.

Felicity was griev'd, and could not bear
A scene so chang'd, a sight of so much care.
She told him with a look of cold disdain,
And seeming ease, as women well can feign,
He might depart at will: a milder air
Would mend his health; he was no pris'ner
there;

She kept him not, and wish'd he ne'er might Cause to regret the place he left behind; [find Which once he lov'd, and where he still must own

He had at least some little pleasure known.

If these prophetic words a while destroy
His peace, the former balance is in joy.
He thank'd her for her kind concern, but chose

To quit the place, the rest let heav'n dispose.
For fate, on mischiefs bent, perverts the will,
And first infatuates whom it means to kill.

Aurora now, not as she wont to rise,
In gay attire, ting'd with a thousand dyes,
But sober-sad, in solemn state appears,
Clad in a dusky veil, bedew'd with tears.
Thick mantling clouds beneath her chariot
spread,

A faded wreath hangs drooping from her head.
The sick'ning sun emits a feeble ray,
Half drown'd in fogs, and struggling into day.
Some black event the threat'ning skies foretell:
Porsenna rose to take his last farewell.

A curious vest the mournful princess brought,
An armour by the Lemnian artist wrought,
A shining lance with secret virtue stor'd,
And of resistless force a magic sword;
Caparisons and gems of wondrous price,
And loaded him with gifts and good advice;
But chief she gave, and what he most would need

The fleetest of her stud, a flying steed.

The swift Grifippo, said th' afflicted fair, (Such was the courser's name) with speed shall bear,

And place you safely in your native air,
Assist against the foe with matchless might,
Ravage the field, and turn the doubtful fight;
With care protect you till the danger cease,
Your trust in war, your ornament in peace.
But this, I warn, beware, whate'er shall lay
To intercept your course, or tempt your stay,
Quit not your saddle, nor your speed abate,
Till safely landed at your palace gate.
On this alone depends your weal or woe;
Such is the will of fate, and so the gods fore-
show.

He in the softest terms repaid her love,
And vow'd nor age nor absence should remove His constant faith, and sure she should not blame

A short divorce due to his injur'd fame.

The debt discharg'd, then should her soldier
come [home;

Gay from the field, and flush'd with conquest,
With equal ardor her affection meet,
And lay his laurels at his mistress' feet.

He ceas'd, and sighing took a kind adieu;
Then urg'd his steed; the fierce Grifippo flew
With rapid force, outstripp'd the lagging wind,
And left the blissful shores, and weeping fair behind;

Now o'er the seas pursu'd his airy flight,
Now scour'd the plains, and climb'd the mountain's height. [run

Thus driving on at speed, the prince had Near half his course, when, with the setting
sun,

As through a lonely lane he chanc'd to ride,
With rocks and bushes fenc'd on either side,
He spied a waggon full of wings, that lay
Broke and o'erturn'd across the narrow way:
The helpless driver on the dirty road

Lay struggling crush'd beneath th' incumbent
Never in human shape was seen before [load.

A wight so pale, so feeble, and so poor,
Comparisons of age would do him wrong,
For Nestor's self if plac'd by him were young.
His limbs were naked all, and worn so thin,
The bones seem'd starting through the parchment skin; [weak,

His eyes half drown'd in rheum, his accents
Bald was his head, and furrow'd was his cheek.

The conscious steed stopt short in deadly
fright,

And back recoiling stretch'd his wings for flight;

While thus the wretch with supplicating tone,
And rueful face, began his piteous moan;

And, as he spake, the tears ran trickling down:
O gentle youth, if pity e'er inclined

Thy soul to gen'rous deed, if e'er thy mind
Was touch'd with soft distress, extend thy care

To save an old man's life, and ease the load I bear.

So may propitious heaven your journey speed,
Prolong your days, and all your vows succeed.

Mov'd with the pray'r the kind Porsenna staid,

Too nobly minded to refuse his aid;
And, prudence yielding to superior grief,

Leapt from his steed, and ran to his relief;
Remov'd the weight, and gave the pris'ner
breath,

Just choak'd and gasping on the verge of death,
Then reach'd his hand, when lightly with a bound

The grizly spectre, vaulting from th' ground,
Seiz'd him with sudden gripe; th' astonish'd prince

Stood horror-struck, and thoughtless of defence.

O King of Russia! with a thund'ring sound
Bellow'd the ghastly fiend, at length thou'rt
found;

Receive the ruler of mankind, and know,
My name is Time, thy ever dreaded foe. [see

These feet are founder'd, and the wings you
Worn to the pinions in pursuit of thee;

Through all the world in vain for ages sought,
But fate has doom'd thee now, and thou art caught.

Then round his neck his arms he nimbly cast,
And seiz'd him by the throat, and grasp'd him
fast;

Till forc'd at length the soul forsook its seat,
And the pale breathless corse fell bleeding at his feet.

Scarce had the cursed spoiler left his prey,
When, so it chanc'd, young Zephyr pass'd that
way;

Too late his presence to assist his friend,
A sad, but helpless witness of his end.

He chafes, and fans, and strives in vain to cure
His streaming wounds; the work was done too sure.

Now lightly with a soft embrace uprears
The lifeless load, and bathes it in his tears;

Then to the blissful seats with speed conveys,
And graceful on the mossy carpet lays,

With decent care, close by the fountain's side
Where first the princess had her phoenix spied.

There with sweet flowers his lovely limbs he strew'd,

And gave a parting kiss, and sighs and tears
bestow'd.

To that sad solitude the weeping dame,
Wild with her loss, and swoln with sorrow,
came;

There was she wont to vent her griefs and mourn

Those dear delights that must no more return.
Thither that morn with more than usual care

She sped, but O, what joy to find him there,
As just arriv'd, and weary with the way,

Retir'd to soft repose her hero lay.
Now near approaching she began to creep

With careful steps, loath to disturb his sleep:
Till quite o'ercome with tenderness she flew

And round his neck her arms in transport threw. [tell

But when she found him dead, no tongue can
The pangs she felt; she shriek'd, and swooning fell.

Waking, with loud laments she pierc'd the skies,
And fill'd th' affrighted forest with her cries.

That fatal hour the palace gates she barr'd,
And fix'd around the coast a stronger guard;

Now rare appearing, and at distance seen,
With crowds of black misfortunes plac'd between,

Mischiefs of every kind, corroding care,
And fears, and jealousies, and dark despair:

And since that day (the wretched world must own [known)

These mournful truths by sad experience
No mortal e'er enjoy'd that happy clime,

And every thing on earth submits to Time.

SONNETS, BY SMITH.

§ 130. To the Moon.

QUEEN of the silver bow! by thy pale beam,
Alone and pensive I delight to stray,
And watch thy shadow trembling in the stream,
Or mark the floating clouds that cross thy way.

And while I gaze, thy mild and placid light
Sheds a soft calm upon my troubled breast;
And oft I think, fair planet of the night!
That in thy orb the wretched may have rest;
The sufferers of the earth perhaps may go,
Releas'd by death, to thy benignant sphere;
And the sad children of despair and woe
Forget, in thee, their cup of sorrow here.
O! that I soon may reach thy world serene,
Poor wearied pilgrim—in this toiling scene!

§ 131. On the Departure of the Nightingale.

SWEET poet of the woods—a long adieu!
Farewell, soft minstrel of the early year!
Ah! 'twill be long ere thou shalt sing anew,
And pour thy music on the 'night's dull ear.'

Whether on spring thy wandering flights await,
Or whether silent in our groves you dwell,
The pensive muse shall own thee for her mate,
And still protect the song she loves so well.
With cautious step the love-lorn youth shall glide [nest,

Thro' the lone brake that shades thy mossy
And shepherd girls from eyes profane shall hide
The gentle bird, who sings of pity best:
For still thy voice shall soft affections move,
And still be dear to sorrow and to love!

§ 132. Written at the Close of Spring.

THE garlands fade that Spring so lately wove,
Each simple flow'r which she had nurs'd in dew,

Anemonies, that spangled every grove,
The primrose wan, and hare-bell mildly blue.
No more shall violets linger in the dell,
Or purple orchis variegate the plain,
Till spring again shall call forth every bell,
And dress with humid hands her wreaths again.—

Ah! poor humanity! so frail, so fair,
Are the fond visions of thy early day,
Till tyrant passion and corrosive care
Bid all thy fairy colours fade away!
Another May new buds and flow'rs shall
bring;
Ah! why has happiness—no second Spring?

§ 133. Should the lone Wanderer.

SHOULD the lone wanderer, fainting on his
way,

Rest for a moment of the sultry hours,
And tho' his path thro' thorns and roughness
lay,

Pluck the wild rose, or woodbine's gadding flow'rs;

Weaving gay wreaths, beneath some sheltering tree,

The sense of sorrow he a while may lose;
So have I sought thy flow'rs, fair Poesy!

So charm'd my way with Friendship and the Muse.

But darker grows life's unhappy day,

Dark with new clouds of evil yet to come:

Her pencil sickening Fancy throws away,

And weary Hope reclines upon the tomb;

And points my wishes to that tranquil shore,
Where the pale spectre Care pursues no more.

§ 134. To Night.

I LOVE thee, mournful sober-suited night,
When the faint moon, yet lingering in her wane,

And veil'd in clouds, with pale uncertain light
Hangs o'er the waters of the restless main.

In deep depression sunk, th' enfeebled mind
Will to the deaf, cold elements complain,
And tell th' embosom'd grief, however vain,
To sullen surges and the viewless wind:

Tho' no repose on thy dark breast I find,
I still enjoy thee, cheerless as thou art;

For in thy quiet gloom th' exhausted heart
Is calm, tho' wretched; hopeless, yet resign'd:

While to the winds and waves its sorrows given,
May reach—though lost on earth—the ear of Heaven!

§ 135. To Tranquillity.

IN this tumultuous sphere, for thee unfit,
How seldom art thou found, Tranquillity!

Unless 'tis when with mild and downcast
eye

By the low cradles thou delight'st to sit
Of sleeping infants, watching the soft breath,

And bidding the sweet slumberers easy lie,
Or sometimes hanging o'er the bed of death,

Where the poor languid sufferer hopes to die.
O beauteous sister of the halcyon peace!

I sure shall find thee in that heavenly scene
Where care and anguish shall their power resign; [cease;

Where hope alike and vain regret shall
And Memory, lost in happiness serene,
Repeat no more—that misery has been mine!

§ 136. Written in the Churchyard at Middleton in Sussex.

PRESS'D by the Moon, mute arbitress of tides,
While the loud equinox its power combines,

The sea no more its swelling surge confines,
But o'er the shrinking land sublimely rides.

The wild blast, rising from the western cave,
Drives the huge billows from their heaving
bed;

Tears from their grassy tombs the village dead,
And breaks the silent sabbath of the grave!

With shells and sea-weed mingled, on the shore,
Lo! their bones whiten in the frequent
wave;

But vain to them the winds and waters rave:
They hear the warring elements no more:

While I am doom'd, by life's long storm op-
prest,

To gaze with envy on their gloomy rest.

§ 137. Written at Penthurst, in Autumn, 1788.

YE tow'rs sublime, deserted now and drear,

Ye woods, deep sighing to the hollow blast,

The musing wanderer loves to linger near,

While history points to all your glories past:

And startling from their haunts the timid deer,
To trace the walks obscured by matted fern,
Which Waller's soothing lyre were wont to hear,

But where now clamors the discordant horn!
The spoiling hand of time may overturn

These lofty battlements, and quite deface
The fading canvass whence we love to learn
Sydney's keen look, and Sacharissa's grace;
But fame and beauty still defy decay,
Sav'd by th' historic page, the poet's tender lay!

§ 138. Elegy.

'DARK gathering clouds involve the threatening skies,

The sea heaves conscious of th' impending gloom,

Deep hollow murmurs from the cliffs arise;
They come—the spirits of the tempest come!

O! may such terrors mark th' approaching
night

As reign'd on that these streaming eyes deplore!

Flash, ye red fires of heaven, with fatal light,
And with conflicting winds, ye waters, roar!

Loud and more loud, ye foaming billows, burst!

Ye warring elements more fiercely rave!

Till the wide waves o'erwhelm the spot accurst

Where ruthless Avarice finds a quiet grave!

'Thus with clasp'd hands, wild looks, and streaming hair,

While shrieks of horror broke her trembling
speech,

A wretched maid, the victim of despair,

Survey'd the threatening storm and desert beach.

Then to the tomb where now the father slept
Whose rugged nature bad her sorrows flow,
Frantic she turn'd—and beat her breast and wept,
Invoking vengeance on the dust below.

'Lo! rising there above each humble heap,
Yon cipher'd stones his name and wealth relate,

Who gave his son, remorseless, to the deep,
While I, his living victim, curse my fate.

O my lost love! no tomb is plac'd for thee,
That may to strangers' eyes thy worth impart!
Thou hast no grave but in the stormy sea,
And no memorial but this breaking heart.

Forth to the world a widow'd wanderer driven,
I pour to winds and waves th' unheeded tear;
Try with vain effort to submit to heaven,
And fruitless call on him "who cannot hear."

O might I fondly clasp him once again,
While o'er my head th' infuriate billows pour,
Forget in death this agonizing pain,
And feel his father's cruelty no more!

Part, raging waters! part, and show beneath,
In your dread caves his pale and mangled
form;

Now, while the demons of despair and death
Ride on the blast, and urge the howling storm!

Lo! by the lightning's momentary blaze,
I see him rise the whitening waves above,
No longer such as when in happier days
He gave th' enchanted hours to me and love:

Such as when daring the enchain'd sea,
And courting dangerous toil, he often said,
That every peril, one soft smile from me,
One sigh of speechless tenderness, o'erpaid:

But dead, disfigured, while between the roar
Of the loud waves his accents pierce mine ear,
And seem to say—Ah, wretch! delay no more,
But come, unhappy mourner—meet me here.

Yet, powerful fancy, bid the phantom stay,
Still let me hear him!—"Tis already past;
Along the waves his shadow glides away,
I lose his voice amid the deafening blast.

Ah! wild illusion, born of frantic pain!
He hears not, comes not from his wat'ry bed;
My tears, my anguish, my despair are vain,
Th' insatiate ocean gives not up its dead.

'Tis not his voice! Hark! the deep thunders roll!

Upheaves the ground; the rocky barriers fail;
Approach, ye horrors that delight my soul,
Despair, and Death, and Desolation, hail!

The ocean hears—th' embodied waters come,
Rise o'er the land, and with resistless sweep
Tear from its base the proud aggressor's tomb,
And bear the injur'd to eternal sleep!

§ 139. Elegy to Pity. ANON.

HAIL, lovely Pow'r! whose bosom heaves the sigh,

When Fancy paints the scene of deep distress;

Whose tears spontaneous crystallize the eye,
When rigid Fate denies the pow'r to bless.

Not all the sweets Arabia's gales convey
From flow'ry meads, can with that sigh
compare:

Not dew-drops glittering in the morning ray
Seem near so beauteous as that falling tear.

Devoid of fear, the fawns around thee play;
Emblem of peace, the dove before thee flies;
No blood-stain'd traces mark thy blameless
way,

Beneath thy feet no hapless insect dies.

Come, lovely nymph! and range the mead with me,

To spring the partridge from the guileful
foe,

From secret snares the struggling bird to free,
And stop the hand uprais'd to give the blow.

And when the air with heat meridian glows,
And nature droops beneath the conquering gleam,

Let us, slow wandering where the current flows,

Save sinking flies that float along the stream.

Or turn to nobler, greater tasks thy care,
 To me thy sympathetic gifts impart;
 Teach me in Friendship's grief to bear a share,
 And justly boast the generous feeling heart.
 Teach me to soothe the helpless orphan's grief,
 With timely aid the widow's woe assuage,
 To Misery's moving cry to yield relief,
 And be the sure resource of drooping age.
 So when the genial spring of life shall fade,
 And sinking nature owns the dread decay,
 Some soul congenial then may lend its aid,
 And gild the close of life's eventful day.

§ 140. Extract from a Poem on his own approaching Death, by MICHAEL BRUCE.

Now spring returns; but not to me returns
 The vernal joy my better years have known:
 Dim in my breast life's dying taper burns,
 And all the joys of life with health are flown.

Starting and shiv'ring in th' inconstant wind,
 Meagre and pale, the ghost of what I was,
 Beneath some blasted tree I lie reclin'd,
 And count the silent moments as they pass:
 The winged moments, whose unstaying speed
 No art can stop, or in their course arrest;
 Whose flight shall shortly count me with the
 dead,
 And lay me down in peace with them that rest.

Oft morning dreams presage approaching fate;
 And morning dreams, as poets tell, are true:
 Led by pale ghosts, I enter death's dark gate,
 And bid the realms of light and life adieu!

I hear the helpless wail, the shriek of woe;
 I see the muddy wave, the dreary shore,
 The sluggish streams that slowly creep below,
 Which mortals visit, and return no more.

Farewell, ye blooming fields! ye cheerful
 plains!
 Enough for me the churchyard's lonely
 mound,
 Where Melancholy with still Silence reigns,
 And the rank grass waves o'er the cheerless
 ground.

There let me wander at the close of eve,
 When sleep sits dewy on the laborer's eyes,
 The world and all its busy follies leave,
 And talk with wisdom where my Daphnis
 lies.

There let me sleep, forgotten, in the clay,
 When death shall shut these weary aching
 eyes,
 Rest in the hopes of an eternal day,
 Till the long night is gone, and the last morn arise.

§ 141. Sonnet to Twilight.

MISS WILLIAMS.

MEEK Twilight! haste to shroud the solar ray,
 And bring the hour my pensive spirit loves;
 When o'er the hill is shed a paler day,
 That gives to stillness, and to night, the groves.

Ah! let the gay, the roseate morning hail,
 When, in the various blooms of light array'd,
 She bids fresh beauty live along the vale,
 And rapture tremble in the vocal shade:
 Sweet is the lucid morning's op'ning flow'r,
 Her choral melodies benignly rise;
 Yet dearer to my soul the shadowy hour,
 At which her blossoms close, her music dies:
 For then mild nature, while she droops her
 head,
 Wakes the soft tear 'tis luxury to shed.

§ 142. Sonnet to Expression.

MISS WILLIAMS.

EXPRESSION, child of soul! I love to trace Thy strong enchantments, when the poet's lyre,
 The painter's pencil, catch the vivid fire,
 And beauty wakes for thee each touching grace!
 But from my frightened gaze thy form avert,
 When horror chills thy tear, thy ardent sigh,
 When phrensy rolls in thy impassion'd eye,
 Or guilt lives fearful at thy troubled heart;
 Nor ever let my shudd'ring fancy hear
 The wasting groan, or view the pallid look
 Of him the Muses lov'd*, when hope forsook
 His spirit, vainly to the Muses dear—
 For charm'd with heavenly song, this bleeding
 breast
 Mourns it could sharpen ill, and give despair no rest!

§ 143. Sonnet to Hope.

MISS WILLIAMS.

O, EVER skill'd to wear the form we love!
 To bid the shapes of fear and grief depart,
 Come, gentle Hope, with one gay smile remove
 The lasting sadness of an aching heart;
 Thy voice, benign enchantress! let me hear;
 Say that for me some pleasures yet shall bloom!
 That fancy's radiance, friendship's precious
 tear,
 Shall soften, or shall chase, misfortune's
 gloom.—
 But come not glowing in the dazzling ray
 Which once with dear illusions charm'd my eye!
 O strew no more, sweet flatterer! on my way
 The flow'rs I fondly thought too bright to die.
 Visions less fair will soothe my pensive breast,
 That asks not happiness, but longs for rest!

§ 144. Sonnet to the Moon.

MISS WILLIAMS.

THE glittering colours of the day are fled—
 Come, melancholy orb! that dwell'st with
 night;
 Come! and o'er earth thy wand'ring lustre
 shed,
 Thy deepest shadow and thy softest light.
 To me congenial is the gloomy grove,
 When with faint rays the sloping uplands
 shine;
 That gloom, those pensive rays, alike I love,
 Whose sadness seems in sympathy with mine!

* Chatterton.

But most for this, pale orb ! thy light is dear,
For this, benignant orb ! I hail thee most,
That while I pour the unavailing tear,
And mourn that hope to me, in youth is lost !
Thy light can visionary thoughts impart,
And lead the Muse to soothe a suff'ring heart.

§ 145. On the Recovery of a Lady of Quality from the Small-Pox. SAVAGE.

Long lov'd fair had bless'd her consort's sight
With amorous pride, and undisturb'd delight ;
Till Death, grown envious, with repugnant aim
Frown'd at their joys, and urg'd a tyrant's claim.
He summons each disease !—the noxious crew,
Writhing in dire distortions, strike his view !
From various plagues, which various natures

know,
Forth rushes beauty's fear'd and fervent foe.
Fierce to the fair the missile mischief flies,
The sanguine streams in raging ferments rise !
It drives, ignipotent, through every vein,
Hangs on the heart, and burns around the brain !

Now a chill damp the charmer's lustre dims :
Sad o'er her eyes the livid languor swims !
Her eyes, that with a glance could joy inspire,
Like setting stars, scarce shoot a glimmering
fire.

Here stands her consort, sore with anguish
press'd,

Grief in his eye, and terror in his breast.
The Paphian Graces, smit with anxious care,
In silent sorrow weep the waning fair.
Eight suns, successive, roll their fire away,
And eight slow nights see their deep shades
decay.

While these revolve, though mute each Muse appears,

Each speaking eye drops eloquence in tears.
On the ninth noon great Phœbus listening bends,
On the ninth noon each voice in prayer ascends—
Great God of light, of song, and physic's art,
Restore the languid fair, new soul impart !
Her beauty, wit, and virtue claim thy care,
And thine own bounty's almost rivall'd there.

Each paus'd : the god assents. Would death advance ?

Phœbus unseen arrests that threatening lance !
Down from his orb a vivid influence streams,
And quickening earth imbibes salubrious beams ;
Each balmy plant increase of virtue knows,
And art inspir'd with all her patron glows.
The charmer's opening eye kind hope reveals,
Kind hope her consort's breast enlivening feels ;
Each grace revives, each Muse resumes the lyre,
Each beauty brightens with relumin'd fire :
As health's auspicious pow'rs gay life display,
Death, sullen at the sight, stalks slow away.

§ 146. Ode to Pity. COLLINS.

O THOU, the friend of man assign'd,
With balmy hands his wounds to bind,
And charm his frantic woe ;
When first Distress, with dagger keen,
Broke forth to waste his destin'd scene,
His wild unsated foe !

By Pella's Bard, a magic name,
By all the griefs his thought could frame,
Receive my humble rite :
Long, Pity, let the nations view
Thy sky-worn robes of tenderest blue,
And eyes of dewy light !

But wherefore need I wander wide
To old Ilissus' distant side,

Deserted stream, and mute ?
Wild Arun* too has heard thy strains,
And Echo, 'midst my native plains,
Been sooth'd by Pity's lute.

There first the wren thy myrtles shed
On gentlest Otway's infant head :

To him thy cell was shown :
And while he sung the female heart,
With youth's soft notes unspoil'd by art,
The turtles mix'd their own.

Come, Pity, come, by fancy's aid,
E'en now my thoughts, relenting maid,
Thy temple's pride design :
Its southern site, its truth complete
Shall raise a wild enthusiast heat,
In all who view the shrine.

There Picture's toil shall well relate
How chance or hard involving fate,
O'er mortal bliss prevail :

The buskin'd Muse shall near her stand,
And sighing prompt her tender hand,
With each disastrous tale.

There let me oft, retir'd by day,
In dreams of passion melt away,
Allow'd with thee to dwell :
There waste the mournful lamp of night,
Till, Virgin, thou again delight
To hear a British shell !

§ 147. Ode to Fear. COLLINS.

THOU, to whom the world unknown
With all its shadowy shapes is shown ;
Who seest appall'd th' unreal scene,
While Fancy lifts the veil between :
Ah, Fear ! ah, frantic fear !
I see, I see thee near.

I know thy hurried step, thy haggard eye !
Like thee I start, like thee disorder'd fly ;
For, lo, what monsters in thy train appear !
Danger, whose limbs of giant mould
What mortal eye can fix'd behold ?
Who stalks his round, a hideous form,
Howling amidst the midnight storm,
Or throws him on the rigid steep
Of some loose hanging rock to sleep ;
And with him thousand phantoms join'd,
Who prompt to deeds accurst the mind :
And those, the fiends, who near allied,
O'er nature's wounds and wrecks preside ;
While Vengeance, in the lurid air,
Lifts her red arm, expos'd and bare :
On whom that ravening brood of fate,
Who lap the blood of Sorrow, wait :
Who, Fear, this ghastly train can see,
And look not madly wild, like thee ?

EPODE.

In earliest Greece, to thee, with partial choice,
The grief-full Muse address'd her infant
tongue,

The maids and matrons, on her awful voice,
Silent and pale, in wild amazement hung.

Yet he, the Bard* who first invok'd thy name,
Disdain'd in Marathon its pow'r to feel:

For not alone he nurs'd the poet's flame,
But reach'd from Virtue's hand the patriot's steel.

But who is he, whom later garlands grace,
Who left a while o'er Hybla's dew to rove,
With trembling eyes thy dreary steps to trace,
Where thousand furies shar'd the baleful
grove?

Wrapt in thy cloudy veil th' incestuous Queen†
Sigh'd the sad call her son and husband heard,
When once alone it broke the silent scene,
And he the wretch of Thebes no more appear'd.

O Fear, I know thee by my throbbing heart,
Thy withering pow'r inspir'd each mournful
line;

Though gentle Pity claim her mingled part,
Yet all the thunders of the scene are thine.

ANTISTROPHE.

Thou, who such weary length hast past,
Where wilt thou rest, mad nymph, at last?
Say, wilt thou shroud in haunted cell,
Where gloomy Rape and Murder dwell?

Or in some hollow'd seat,
'Gainst which the big waves beat,
Hear drowning seamen's cries in tempests
brought!

Dark pow'r, with shuddering meek submitted
thought,

Be mine, to read the visions old,
Which thy awakening bards have told,
And, lest thou meet my blasted view
Hold each strange tale devoutly true.

Ne'er be I found, by thee o'eraw'd,
In that thrice-hollow'd eve abroad;
When ghosts, as cottage maids believe,
Their pebbled beds permitted leave,
And goblins haunt from fire, or fen,
Or mine, or flood, the walks of men!

O thou, whose spirit most possess'd
The sacred seat of Shakspeare's breast!
By all that from thy prophet broke,
In thy divine emotion spoke!

Hither again thy fury deal,
Teach me but once like him to feel;
His cypress wreath my meed decree;
And I, O Fear, will dwell with thee!

§ 148. Ode to Simplicity. COLLINS.

O THOU, by Nature taught,
To breathe her genuine thought,
In numbers warmly pure, and sweetly strong:
Who first on mountains wild,
In Fancy, loveliest child,
Thy babe and Pleasure's nurs'd the pow'rs of
song!

* Æschylus.

† Jocasta.

Thou, who with hermit heart
Disdain'st the wealth of art,
And gauds, and pageant weeds, and trailing pall:

But com'st a decent maid,
In Attic robe array'd,
O chaste, unboastful nymph, to thee I call!
By all the honey'd store
On Hybla's thymy shore,
By all her blooms, and mingled murmurs dear,
By her whose love-lorn woe.

In evening musings slow,
Sooth'd sweetly sad Electra's poet's ear:

By old Cephissus deep,
Who spread his wavy sweep
In warbled wand'rings round thy green retreat,
On whose enamell'd side,
When holy Freedom died,
No equal haunt allur'd thy future feet.

O sister meek of Truth,
To my admiring youth
Thy sober aid and native charms infuse!
The flow'rs that sweetest breathe,
Though beauty cull'd the wreath,
Still ask thy hand to range their order'd hues.

While Rome could none esteem,
But virtue's patriot theme,
You lov'd her hills, and led her laureate band;
But staid to sing alone
To one distinguish'd throne,
And turn'd thy face, and fled her alter'd land.

No more, in hall or bow'r,
The passions own thy pow'r.
Love, only Love her forceless numbers mean;
For thou hast left her shrine,
Nor olive more, nor vine,
Shall gain thy feet to bless the servile scene.

Though taste, though genius bless
To some divine excess,
Faint's the cold work till thou inspire the whole;

What each, what all supply,
May court, may charm our eye,
Thou, only thou, canst raise the meeting soul!

Of these let others ask,
To aid some mighty task,
I only seek to find thy temperate vale;
Where oft my reed might sound
To maids and shepherds round,
And all thy sons, O Nature, learn my tale.

§ 149. Ode on the Poetical Character.

COLLINS.

As one, if, not with light regard,
I read aright that gifted Bard,
(Him whose school above the rest
His loveliest Elfin queen has bless'd,)
One, only one unrivall'd fair†
May hope the magic girdle wear,
At solemn tourney hung on high,
The wish of each love-darting eye!
Lo! to each other nymph in turn applied,
As if, in air unseen, some hovering hand,
Some chaste and angel-friend to virgin fame,

† Florimel. See Spenser, Leg 4.

With whisper'd spell had burst the starting band,
It left unblest her loath'd dishonor'd side:
Happy, her hopeless fair, if never
Her baffled hand with vain endeavour
Had touch'd that fatal zone to her denied!
Young Fancy thus, to me divinest name,
To whom, prepar'd and bath'd in heaven,
The cest of amplest pow'r is given,
To few the godlike gift assigns,
To gird their blest prophetic loins,
And gaze her vision wild, and feel unmix'd her flame!

The band, as fairy legends say,
Was wove on that creating day
When he, who call'd with thought to birth
Yon tented sky, this laughing earth,
And dress'd with springs, and forests tall,
And pour'd the main engirthing all,
Long by the lov'd enthusiast woo'd,
Himself in some diviner mood,
Retiring, sate with her alone,
And plac'd her on his sapphire throne,
The whiles, the vaulted shrine around,
Seraphic wires were heard to sound,
Now sublimest triumph swelling,
Now on love and mercy dwelling;
And she from out the veiling cloud
Breath'd her magic notes aloud:
And thou, thou rich-hair'd youth of morn,
And all thy subject life was born!
The dangerous passions kept aloof,
Far from the sainted growing woof:
But near it sat ecstatic Wonder,
Listening the deep applauding thunder:
And Truth, in sunny vest array'd,
By whose the tarsel's eyes were made;
All the shadowy tribes of mind,
In braided dance their murmurs join'd,
And all the bright uncounted pow'rs,
Who feed on heaven's ambrosial flow'rs.
Where is the Bard whose soul can now
Its high presuming hopes avow?
Where he who thinks, with rapture blind,
This hallow'd work for him design'd?
High on some cliff to heaven up-pil'd,
Of rude access, of prospect wild,
Where tangled round the jealous steep,
Strange shades o'erbrow the valleys deep,
And holy Genii guard the rock,
Its glooms embrown, its springs unlock;
While on its rich ambitious head
An Eden, like his own, lies spread,
I view that oak, the fancied glades among,
By which as Milton lay, his evening ear,
From many a cloud that dropp'd ethereal dew,
Nigh spher'd in heaven its native strains could
hear:
On which that ancient trump he reach'd was hung:

Thither oft, his glory greeting,
From Waller's myrtle shades retreating,
With many a vow from Hope's aspiring tongue,
My trembling feet his guiding steps pursue;
In vain—such bliss to one alone
Of all the sons of soul was known,

And Heaven and Fancy, kindred pow'rs,
Have now o'erturn'd th' inspiring bow'rs,
Or curtain'd close such scene from every future
view.

§ 150. Ode. Written in the year 1746.
COLLINS.

How sleep the brave, who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest!
When Spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck their hallow'd mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.
By Fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall a while repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there!

§ 151. Ode to Mercy. COLLINS.

STROPHE.

O THOU, who sitt'st a smiling bride
By Valor's arm'd and awful side,
Gentlest of sky-born forms, and best adorn'd:
Who oft with songs, divine to hear,
Winn'st from his fatal grasp the spear,
And hid'st in wreaths of flowers his bloodless
sword!
Thou who, amidst the deathful field,
By godlike chiefs alone beheld,
Oft with thy bosom bare art found,
Pleading for him the youth who sinks to ground:
See, Mercy, see, with pure and loaded hands,
Before thy shrine my country's genius stands,
And decks thy altar still, though pierc'd with many a wound!

ANTISTROPHE.

When he whom e'en our joys provoke,
The fiend of Nature, join'd his yoke,
And rush'd in wrath to make our isle his prey;
Thy form, from out thy sweet abode,
O'ertook him on his blasted road,
And stopp'd his wheels, and look'd his rage
away.
I see recoil'd his sable steeds,
That bore him swift to savage deeds;
Thy tender melting eyes they own,
O Maid, for all thy love to Britain shown,
Where Justice bars her iron tow'r,
To thee we build a roseate bow'r,
Thou, thou shalt rule our queen, and share our monarch's throne.

§ 152. Ode to Liberty. COLLINS.

STROPHE.

Who shall awake the Spartan fife,
And call in solemn sounds to life

The youths whose locks divinely spreading,
 Like vernal hyacinths in sullen hue,
 At once the breath of fear and virtue shedding,
 Applauding Freedom lov'd of old to view!
 What new Alcæus, fancy-blest,
 Shall sing the sword in myrtles drest,
 At Wisdom's shrine a while its flame conceal-
 ing,
 (What place so fit to seal a deed renown'd?)
 Till she her brightest lightnings round revealing, [wound!
 It leap'd in glory forth, and dealt her prompted
 O goddess, in that feeling hour,
 When most its sounds would court thy ears,
 Let not my shell's misguided pow'r
 E'er draw thy sad, thy mindful tears.
 No, Freedom, no, I will not tell,
 How Rome, before thy face,
 With heaviest sound, a giant-statue, fell,
 Push'd by a wild and artless race,
 From off its wide ambitious base,
 When Time his northern sons of spoil awoke,
 And all the blended work of strength and
 With many a rude repeated stroke, [grace,
 And many a barbarous yell, to thousand fragments broke.

EPODE.

Yet, e'en where'er the least appear'd,
 Th' admiring world thy hand rever'd;
 Still, 'midst the scatter'd states around,
 Some remnants of her strength were found:
 They saw, by what escap'd the storm,
 How wondrous rose her perfect form;
 How in the great, the labor'd whole,
 Each mighty master pour'd his soul;
 For sunny Florence, seat of art,
 Beneath her vines preserv'd a part,
 Till they, whom science lov'd to name,
 (O who could fear it?) quench'd her flame;
 And, lo, an humbler relic laid
 In jealous Pisa's olive shade;
 See small Marino joins the theme,
 Though least, not last in thy esteem.
 Strike, louder strike th' ennobling strings
 To those whose merchant sons were kings;
 To him who, deck'd with pearly pride,
 In Adria weds his green-hair'd bride:
 Hail, port of glory, wealth, and pleasure,
 Ne'er let me change this Lydian measure;

Nor e'er her former pride relate
 To sad Liguria's bleeding state.
 Ah, no! more pleas'd thy haunts I seek
 On wild Helvetia's mountains bleak,
 (Where, when the favor'd of thy choice,
 The daring archer, heard thy voice;
 Forth from his eyrie rous'd in dread,
 The ravening eagle northward fled :)
 Or dwell in willow'd meads more near,
 With those *to whom thy stork is dear;
 Those whom the rod of Alva bruis'd;
 Whose crown a British queen refus'd!
 The magic works, thou feel'st the strains,
 One holier name alone remains:
 The perfect spell shall then avail,
 Hail, Nymph, adorn'd by Britain, hail!

ANTISTROPHE.

Beyond the measure vast of thought,
 The works the wizard time has wrought,
 The Gaul, 'tis held of antique story,
 Saw Britain link'd to his now adverse strand†,
 No sea between, nor cliff sublime and hoary,
 He pass'd with unwet feet through all our land.
 To the blown Baltic then, they say,
 The wild waves found another way,
 Where Orcas howls, his wolfish mountains
 rounding;
 Till all the banded west at once 'gan rise,
 A wide wild storm e'en nature's self confound-
 ing,
 Withering her giant sons, with strange un-
 couth surprise,
 This pillar'd earth, so firm and wide,
 By winds and inward labors torn,
 In thunders dread was push'd aside,
 And down the shouldering billows borne.
 And see like gems her laughing train,
 The little isles on every side—
 Mona‡, once hid from those who search'd the
 main,
 Where thousand elfin shapes abide,
 And Wight, who checks the western tide—
 For thee consenting heaven has each bestow'd
 A fair attendant on her sovereign pride;
 To thee this blest divorce she ow'd,
 For thou hast made her vales thy lov'd, thy last abode.

* The Dutch: among whom there are very severe penalties for those who are convicted of killing this bird. They are kept tame in almost all their towns, and particularly at the Hague, of the arms of which they make a part. The common people of Holland are said to entertain a superstitious sentiment, that if the whole species of them should become extinct, they should lose their liberties.

† This tradition is mentioned by several of our old historians. Some naturalists too have endeavoured to support the probability of the fact, by arguments drawn from the correspondent disposition of the two opposite coasts. I do not remember that any poetical use has been hitherto made of it.

‡ There is a tradition in the Isle of Man, that a Mermaid, becoming enamoured of a young man of extraordinary beauty, took the opportunity of meeting him one day as he walked on the shore, and opened her passion to him, but was received with a coldness, occasioned by his horror and surprise at her appearance. This, however, was so misconstrued by the sea-lady, that, in revenge for his treatment of her, she punished the whole island, by covering it with a mist, so that all who attempted to carry on any commerce with it, either never arrived at it, but wandered up and down the sea, or were on a sudden wrecked upon its cliffs.

SECOND EPODE.

Then too, 'tis said, an hoary pile,
 'Midst the green navel of our isle,
 Thy shrine in some religious wood,
 O soul-enforcing Goddess, stood!
 There oft the painted natives' feet
 Were wont thy form celestial meet:
 Though now with hopeless toil we trace
 Time's backward-rolls, to find its place,
 Whether the fiery-tressy Dane,
 Or Roman's self o'erturn'd the fane,
 Or in what heaven-left age it fell,
 'Twere hard for modern song to tell.
 Yet still, if truth those beams infuse,
 Which guide at once and charm the Muse,
 Beyond yon braided clouds that lie,
 Paving the light-embroider'd sky,
 Amidst the light pavilion'd plains,
 The beauteous model still remains.
 There happier than in islands blest,
 Or bowers by Spring or Hebe drest,
 The chiefs who fill our Albion's story,
 In warlike weeds, retir'd in glory,
 Hear their consorted Druids sing
 Their triumphs to th' immortal string.

How may the poet now unfold
 What never tongue or numbers told?
 How learn, delighted and amaz'd,
 What hands unknown that fabric rais'd?
 E'en now, before his favour'd eyes,
 In Gothic pride it seems to rise!
 Yet Græcia's graceful orders join,
 Majestic, through the mix'd design;
 The secret builder knew to choose
 Each sphere-found gem of richest hues:
 Whate'er heaven's purer mould contains,
 When nearer suns emblaze its veins;
 There on the walls the Patriot's sight
 May ever hang with fresh delight,
 And grav'd with some prophetic rage
 Read Albion's fame through every age.

Ye forms divine, ye laureate band,
 That near her inmost altar stand!
 Now soothe her, to her blissful train
 Blithe Concord's social form to gain.
 Concord, whose myrtle wand can steep
 E'en Anger's blood-shot eyes in sleep:
 Before whose breathing bosom's balm
 Rage drops his steel, and storms grow calm;
 Her let our sires and matrons hoar
 Welcome to Britain's ravag'd shore:
 Our youths, enamour'd of the fair,
 Play with the tangles of her hair;
 Till, in one loud applauding sound,
 The nations shout to her around—
 O how supremely art thou blest,
 Thou, Lady, thou shalt rule the west!

§ 153. Ode to a Lady on the Death of Colonel Charles Ross, in the Action at Fontenoy. Written in May, 1745. COLLINS.

WHILE lost to all his former mirth,
 Britannia's Genius bends to earth,

And mourns the fatal day;
 While stain'd with blood he strives to tear
 Unseemly from his sea-green hair
 The wreaths of cheerful May;

The thoughts which musing pity pays,
 And fond remembrance loves to raise,
 Your faithful hours attend:
 Still Fancy, to herself unkind,
 Awakes to grief the soften'd mind,
 And points the bleeding friend.

By rapid Scheld's descending wave,
 His country's vows shall bless the grave,
 Where'er the youth is laid:
 That sacred spot the village hind
 With every sweetest turf shall bind,
 And Peace protect the shade.

O'er him, whose doom thy virtues grieve,
 Aërial forms shall sit at eve,
 And bend the pensive head;
 And, fallen to save his injur'd land,
 Imperial Honor's awful hand
 Shall point his lonely bed!

The warlike dead of every age,
 Who fill the fair recording page,
 Shall leave their sainted rest;
 And, half-reclining on his spear,
 Each wond'ring chief by turns appear,
 To hail the blooming guest.

Old Edward's sons, unknown to yield,
 Shall crowd from Cressy's laurel'd field,
 And gaze with fix'd delight:
 Again for Britain's wrongs they feel,
 Again they snatch the gleamy steel,
 And wish th' avenging fight.

But, lo! where sunk in deep despair,
 Her garments torn, her bosom bare,
 Impatient Freedom lies!
 Her matted tresses madly spread,
 To every sod which wraps the dead
 She turns her joyless eyes.

Ne'er shall she leave that lowly ground,
 Till notes of triumph bursting round
 Proclaim her reign restor'd:
 Till William seek the sad retreat,
 And bleeding at her sacred feet
 Present the sated sword.

If, weak to soothe so soft an heart,
 These pictur'd glories nought impart
 To dry thy constant tear;
 If yet, in Sorrow's distant eye,
 Expos'd and pale thou see'st him lie,
 Wild war insulting near:

Where'er from time thou court'st relief,
 The Muse shall still, with social grief,
 Her gentlest promise keep:
 E'en humble Harting's cottage vale
 Shall learn the sad repeated tale,
 And bid her shepherds weep.

§ 154. Ode to Evening. COLLINS.

IF aught of oaten stop, or pastoral song,
 May hope, chaste Eve, to soothe thy modest
 Like thy own solemn springs, [ear,
 Thy springs, and dying gales;
 O nymph reserv'd, while now the bright-hair'd
 sun
 Sits in yon western tent, whose cloudy skirts,
 With brede ethereal wove,
 O'erhang his wavy bed:
 Now air is hush'd, save where the weak-ey'd
 bat [wing,
 With short shrill shriek flies by on leathern
 Or where the beetle winds
 His small but sullen horn,
 As oft he rises 'midst the twilight path,
 Against the pilgrim borne in heedless hum:
 Now teach me, maid compos'd,
 To breathe some soften'd strain,
 Whose numbers, stealing through thy darkening
 vale,
 May not unseemly with its stillness suit,
 As, musing slow I hail
 Thy genial lov'd return!
 For when thy folding-star arising shows
 His paly circlet, at his warning lamp,
 The fragrant hours, and elves
 Who slept in buds the day,
 And many a nymph who wreathes her brows
 with sedge,
 And sheds the freshening dew; and, lovelier still,
 The pensive pleasures sweet,
 Prepare thy shadowy car.
 Then let me rove some wild and heathy scene,
 Or find some ruin 'midst its dreary dells,
 Whose walls more awful nod
 By thy religious gleams.
 Or if chill blustering winds, or driving rain,
 Prevent my willing feet, be mine the hut,
 That from the mountain's side
 Views wilds and swelling floods,
 And hamlets brown, and dim-discover'd spires,
 And hears their simple bell, and marks o'er
 all
 Thy dewy fingers draw
 The gradual dusky veil.
 While Spring shall pour his show'rs, as oft he wont,
 And bathe thy breathing tresses, meekest
 Eve!
 While Summer loves to sport
 Beneath thy lingering light;
 While fallow Autumn fills thy lap with leaves;
 Or Winter, yelling through the troublous air
 Affrights thy shrinking train,
 And rudely rends thy robes;
 So long, regardless of thy quiet rule,
 Shall Fancy, Friendship, Science, smiling
 Peace,
 Thy gentlest influence own,
 And love thy favorite name!

§ 155. Ode to Peace. COLLINS.

O THOU, who bad'st thy turtles bear
 Swift from his grasp thy golden hair,
 And sought'st thy native skies;
 When War, by vultures drawn from far,
 To Britain bent his iron car,
 And bade his storms arise!
 Tir'd of his rude tyrannic sway,
 Our youth shall fix some festive day,
 His sullen shrines to burn:
 But thou, who hear'st the turning spheres,
 What sounds may charm thy partial ears,
 And gain thy blest return!

O Peace, thy injur'd robes upbind!
 O rise, and leave not one behind
 Of all thy beamy train!
 The British lion, goddess sweet,
 Lies stretch'd on earth to kiss thy feet,
 And own thy holier reign.

Let others court thy transient smile,
 But come to grace thy western isle,
 By warlike Honor led;
 And while around her ports rejoice,
 While all her sons adore thy choice,
 With him for ever wed!

§ 156. The Manners. An Ode. COLLINS.

FAREWELL, for clearer ken design'd,
 The dim-discover'd tracts of mind;
 Truths which, from action's paths retir'd,
 My silent search in vain requir'd!
 No more my sail that deep explores,
 No more I search those magic shores,
 What regions part the world of soul,
 Or whence thy streams, Opinion, roll:
 If e'er I round such fairy field,
 Some pow'r impart the spear and shield,
 At which the wizard passions fly,
 By which the giant follies die!
 Farewell the porch, whose roof is seen
 Arch'd with th' enlivening olive's green:
 Where Science, prank'd in tissued vest,
 By Reason, Pride, and Fancy drest,
 Comes like a bride, so trim array'd,
 To wed with Doubt in Plato's shade!
 Youth of the quick uncheated sight,
 Thy walks, Observance, more invite;
 O thou! who lov'st that ampler range
 Where life's wide prospects round thee change,
 And with her mingled sons allied,
 Throw'st the prattling page aside:
 To me in converse sweet impart
 To read in man the native heart;
 To learn where Science sure is found,
 From nature as she lives around;
 And, gaz'ng oft her mirror true,
 By turns each shifting image view!
 Till meddling Art's officious lore
 Reverse the lessons taught before,
 Alluring from a safer rule,
 To dream in her enchanted school;
 Thou, Heaven, what'er of great we boast,
 Hast bless'd this social science most.

Retiring hence to thoughtful cell,
 As Fancy breathes her potent spell,
 Not vain she finds the cheerful task :
 In pageant quaint, in motley mask ;
 Behold, before her musing eyes,
 The countless manners round her rise,
 While, ever varying as they pass,
 To some Contempt applies her glass :
 With these the white-rob'd maids combine,
 And those the laughing satyrs join !
 But who is he whom now she views,
 In robe of wild contending hues ?
 Thou by the Passions nurs'd, I greet
 The comic sock that binds thy feet !
 O Humor, thou whose name is known
 To Britain's favor'd isle alone,
 Me too amidst thy band admit,
 There where the young-ey'd healthful Wit
 (Whose jewels in his crisped hair
 Are plac'd each other's beams to share,
 Whom no delights from thee divide)
 In laughter loos'd attends thy side.

By old Miletus * who so long
 Has ceas'd his love-inwoven song ;
 By all you taught the Tuscan maids,
 In chang'd Italia's modern shades ;
 By him † whose knight's distinguish'd name
 Refin'd a nation's lust of fame ;
 Whose tales e'en now, with echoes sweet,
 Castilia's Moorish hills repeat ;
 Or him ‡, whom Seine's blue nymphs de-
 plore,

In watchet weeds on Gallia's shore ;
 Who drew the sad Sicilian maid
 By virtues in her sire betray'd :

O Nature boon, from whom proceed
 Each forceful thought, each prompted deed ;
 If but from thee I hope to feel,
 On all my heart imprint thy seal !
 Let some retreating Cynic find
 Those off-turn'd scrolls I leave behind,
 The Sports and I this hour agree
 To rove thy sceneful world with thee !

§ 157. The Passions. An Ode for Music.
 COLLINS.

WHEN Music, heavenly maid, was young,
 While yet in early Greece she sung,
 The Passions oft, to hear her shell,
 Throng'd around her magic cell,
 Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
 Possess'd beyond the Muses' painting ;
 By turns they felt the glowing mind
 Disturb'd, delighted, rais'd, refin'd :
 Till once, 'tis said, when all were fir'd,
 Fill'd with fury, rapt, inspir'd,
 From the supporting myrtles round
 They snatch'd her instruments of sound :
 And, as they oft had heard apart
 Sweet lessons of her forceful art,
 Each, for Madness rul'd the hour,
 Would prove his own expressive pow'r.

First Fear his hand, its skill to try,
 Amid the chords bewilder'd laid,
 And back recoil'd, he knew not why,
 E'en at the sound himself had made
 Next Anger rush'd, his eyes on fire,
 In lightnings own'd his secret stings,
 In one rude clash he struck the lyre,
 And swept with hurried hand the strings.

With woeful measures wan Despair,
 Low, sullen sounds his grief beguil'd ;
 A solemn, strange, and mingled air,
 'Twas sad by fits, by starts 'twas wild.
 But thou, O Hope, with eyes so fair,
 What was thy delighted measure ?
 Still it whisper'd promis'd pleasure,
 And bade the lovely scenes at distance hail !
 Still would her touch the strain prolong,
 And from the rocks, the woods, the vale,
 She call'd on Echo still through all the song ;
 And where her sweetest theme she chose,
 A soft responsive voice was heard at every close,
 And Hope enchanted smil'd, and wav'd her golden hair.

And longer had she sung—but with a frown,
 Revenge impatient rose :
 He threw his blood-stain'd sword in thunder
 down,

And with a withering look,
 The war-denouncing trumpet took,
 And blew a blast so loud and dread,
 Were ne'er prophetic sounds so full of woe ;
 And ever and anon he beat
 The doubling drum with furious heat :
 And though sometimes, each dreary pause between,
 Dejected Pity at his side
 Her soul-subduing voice applied,
 Yet still he kept his wild unalter'd mien ;
 While each strain'd ball of sight seem'd bursting from his head.

Thy numbers, Jealousy, to nought were fix'd,
 Sad proof of thy distressful state !
 Of differing themes the veering song was mix'd ;
 And now it courted Love, now raving call'd on Hate.

With eyes uprais'd, as one inspir'd,
 Pale Melancholy sat retir'd,
 And from her wild sequester'd seat,
 In notes by distance made more sweet,
 Pour'd through the mellow horn her pensive soul :
 And dashing soft from rocks around,
 Bubbling runnels join'd the sound ;
 Through glades and glooms the mingled measure stole,
 Or o'er some haunted stream with fond delay,
 Round an holy calm diffusing,
 Love of peace and lonely musing,
 In hollow murmurs died away.

* Alluding to the Milesian Tales, some of the earliest romances.

† Cervantes.

‡ Monsieur Le Sage, author of the incomparable adventures of Gil Blas de Santillane, who died in Paris in the year 1746.

But, O how alter'd was its sprightlier tone!
When Cheerfulness, a nymph of healthiest hue,
Her bow across her shoulder flung,
Her buskins gemm'd with morning dew,
Blew an aspiring air, that dale and thicket rung,
The hunter's call to Faun and Dryad known;
The oak-crown'd sisters, and their chaste-eyed queen,

Satyrs and sylvan boys, were seen
Peeping from forth their alleys green;
Brown Exercise rejoic'd to hear,
And Sport leap'd up, and seiz'd his beechen spear.

Last came Joy's ecstatic trial:
He, with viny crown advancing,
First to the lively pipe his hand address'd,
But soon he saw the brisk-awakening viol,
Whose sweet entrancing voice he lov'd the best:
They would have thought, who heard the strain,

They saw in Tempe's vale her native maids,
Amidst the festal sounding shades,
To some unwearied minstrel dancing,
While, as his flying fingers kiss'd the strings,
Love fram'd with Mirth a gay fantastic round;
Loose were her tresses seen, her zone unbound;
And he, amidst his frolic play,
As if he would the charming air repay,
Shook thousand odours from his dewy wings.

O Music, sphere-descended maid,
Friend of pleasure, wisdom's aid!
Why, goddess, why to us denied,
Lay'st thou thy ancient lyre aside?
As, in that lov'd Athenian bow'r,
You learn'd an all-commanding pow'r;
Thy mimic soul, O nymph endear'd!
Can well recall what then it heard.
Where is thy native simple heart,
Devote to virtue, fancy, art?
Arise, as in that elder time,
Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime!
Thy wonders in that godlike age
Fill thy recording sister's page—
'Tis said, and I believe the tale,
Thy humblest reed could more prevail,
Had more of strength, diviner rage,
Than all which charms this laggard age;
E'en all at once together found
Cecilia's mingled world of sound—
O, bid our vain endeavours cease,
Revive the just designs of Greece,
Return in all thy simple state,
Confirm the tales her sons relate!

§ 158. The Pauper's Funeral. CRABBE.

Now once again the gloomy scene explore,
Less gloomy now, the bitter hour is o'er;
The man of many sorrows sighs no more.
Up yonder hill behold how sadly slow
The bier moves winding from the vale below!
There lies the happy dead, from trouble free,
And the glad parish pays the frugal fee.

* Some apology is due for the insertion of a circumstance by no means common: that it has been a subject for complaint in any place is a sufficient reason for its being reckoned among the evils which may happen to the poor, and which must happen to them exclusively; nevertheless, it is just to remark, that such neglect is very rare in any part of the kingdom, and in many parts totally unknown.

No more, O death! thy victim starts to hear
Church-wardens stern, or kingly overseer:
No more the farmer claims his humble bow;
Thou art his lord, the best of tyrants thou!

Now to the church behold the mourners come,
Sedately torpid, and devoutly dumb:
The village children now their games suspend,
To see the bier that bears their ancient friend;
For he was one in all their idle sport,
And like a monarch rul'd their little court;
The pliant bow he form'd, the flying ball,
The bat, the wicket, were his labours all;
Him now they follow to his grave, and stand
Silent and sad, and gazing, hand in hand;
While bending low, their eager eyes explore
The mingled relics of the parish poor:
The bell tolls late, the moping owl flies round,
Fear marks the flight and magnifies the sound;
The busy priest, detain'd by weightier care,
Defers his duty till the day of prayer,
And waiting long, the crowd retire distress'd,
To think a poor man's bones should lie unblest*.

§ 159. The Village Foundling. CRABBE.

To name an infant met our village sires,
Assembled all, as such event requires;
Frequent and full the rural sages sate,
And speakers many urg'd the long debate.
Some hardened knaves who rov'd the country round

Had left a babe within the parish-bound.
First of the fact they question'd—Was it true
The child was brought?—What then remain'd to do?

Was't dead, or living?—this was fairly prov'd;
'Twas pinch'd—it roared, and every doubt removed.

Then by what name th' unwelcome guest to call
Was long a question, and it pass'd them all;
For he who lent a name to babe unknown,
Censorious men might take it for his own.
They look'd about, they ask'd the name of all,
And not one Richard answer'd to the call;
Next they inquir'd the day when, passing by,
Th' unlucky peasant heard the stranger's cry:
This known, how food and raiment they might give

Was next debated, for the rogue would live.
At last with all their words and work content,
Back to their homes the prudent vestry went,
And Richard Monday to the work-house sent.
There he was pinch'd, and pitied, thump'd and
fed,

And duly took his beatings and his bread;
Patient in all control, in all abuse,
He found contempt and kicking have their use.
Sad, silent, supple; bending to the blow,
A slave of slaves, the lowest of the low;
His pliant soul gave way to all things base,
He knew no shame, he dreaded no disgrace:
It seem'd, so well his passions he suppress'd,
No feeling stirr'd his ever torpid breast:

Him might the meanest pauper bruise and cheat;
 He was a foot-stool for the beggar's feet;
 His were the legs that run at all commands,
 They used on all occasions Richard's hands:
 His very soul was not his own; he stole
 As others order'd, and without a dole:
 In all disputes, on either part he lied,
 And freely pledg'd his oath on either side:
 In all rebellions Richard join'd the rest,
 In all detections Richard first confess'd:
 Yet though disgrac'd, he watch'd his time so well,

He rose in favor, when in fame he fell:
 Base was his usage, vile his whole employ,
 And all despis'd and fed the pliant boy.
 At length 'tis time he should abroad be sent,
 Was whispered near him—and abroad he went;
 One morn they called him—Richard answered
 not;

They doom'd him hanging—and in time forgot;
 Yet miss'd him long, as each throughout the clan

Found he had "better spared a better man."

Now Richard's talents for the world were fit,
 He'd no small cunning and had some small wit;
 Had that calm look which seem'd to all assent,
 And that complacent speech which nothing meant.

He'd but one care, and that he strove to hide,
 How best for Richard Monday to provide.
 Steel through opposing plate the magnet draws;
 And steely atoms culls from dust and straws;
 And thus our hero, to his int'rest true,
 Gold through all bars and from each trifle drew.
 But still more surely round the world to go,
 This fortune's child had neither friend nor foe.

Long lost to us at last our man we trace,
 Sir Richard Monday died at Monday Place;
 His lady's worth, his daughter's we peruse,
 And find his grandsons all as rich as Jews:
 He gave reforming charities a sum, [dumb;
 And bought the blessings of the blind and Bequeath'd to missions money from the stocks,
 And Bibles issued from his private box:
 But to his native place severely just,
 He left a pittance bound in rigid trust;
 Two paltry pounds on every quarter's day,
 At church produc'd for forty loaves should pay,
 A stinted gift that to the parish shows,
 He kept in mind their bounty and their blows.

§ 160. The Village Infidel. CRABBE.

His a lone house by dead man's dyke way
 stood,
 And his a nightly haunt in lonely wood:
 Each village inn has heard the ruffian boast,
 That he believ'd in neither God nor ghost;
 That when the sod upon the sinner press'd,
 He, like the saint, had everlasting rest;
 That never priest believ'd his doctrines true,
 But would, for profit, own himself a Jew,
 Or worship wood and stone, as honest heathen
 That fools alone on future worlds rely, [do;
 And all who die for faith, deserve to die.

These maxims, part, th' attorney's clerk pro-
 fess'd;
 His own transcendent genius found the rest.

Our pious matrons heard, and much amaz'd,
 Gaz'd on the man, and trembled as they gaz'd;
 And now his face explor'd, and now his feet,
 Man's dreaded foe in this bad man to meet:
 But him our drunkards as their champion rais'd,
 Their bishop call'd, and as their hero prais'd;
 Though most when sober, and the rest, when sick,

Had little question whence his bishopric.

But he, triumphant spirit, all things dar'd,
 He poach'd the wood, and on the warren snar'd;
 'Twas his at cards each novice to trepan,
 And call the wants of rogues the rights of man;
 Wild as the winds he let his offspring rove,
 And deem'd the marriage bond the bane of love.

What age and sickness for a man so bold
 Had done we know not; none beheld him old:
 By night as business urg'd, he sought the wood,
 The ditch was deep, the rain had caus'd a flood,
 The foot-bridge fail'd, he plung'd beneath the
 deep,

And slept, if truth were his, th' eternal sleep.

§ 161. Funeral of the Lady of the Manor.

CRABBE.

NEXT died the lady who yon hall possess'd,
 And here they brought her noble bones to rest.
 In town she dwelt; forsaken stood the hall,
 Worms eat the floors, the tap'stry fled the wall;
 No fire the kitchen's cheerless grate display'd;
 No cheerful light the long-clos'd sash convey'd!
 The crawling worm that turns a summer-fly
 Here spun his shroud, and laid him up to die
 The winter-death, upon the bed of state;
 The bat shrill shrieking woo'd his flickering
 mate:

To empty rooms the curious came no more,
 From empty cellars turn'd the angry boor,
 And surly beggars curs'd the ever-bolted door.
 To one small room the steward found his way,
 Where tenants followed to complain and pay;
 Yet no complaint before the lady came,
 The feeling servant spar'd the feeble dame,
 Who saw her farms with his observing eyes,
 And answer'd all requests with his replies:
 She came not down her falling groves to view;
 Why should she know what one so faithful knew? [hear

Why come from many clamorous tongues to
 What one so just might whisper in her ear?
 Her oaks or acres, why with care explore,
 Why learn the wants, the sufferings of the poor,
 When one so knowing all their worth could
 trace,

And one so piteous govern'd in her place?

Lo! now, what dismal sons of darkness come
 To bear this daughter of indulgence home,
 Tragedians all, and well arrang'd in black!
 Who nature, feeling, force, expression lack;
 Who cause no tear, but gloomily pass by,
 And shake the sables in the wearied eye,
 That turns disgusted from the pompous scene,
 Proud without grandeur, with profession mean.
 The tear for kindness past affection owes,
 For worth deceas'd the sigh from reason flows;
 E'en well-feign'd passions for our sorrows call,
 And real tears for mimic miseries fall;

But this poor farce has neither truth nor art
To please the fancy, or to touch the heart;
Unlike the darkness of the sky, that pours
On the dry ground its fertilizing showers;
Unlike to that which strikes the soul with dread,
When thunders roar, and forked fires are shed:
Dark but not awful, dismal but yet mean,
With anxious bustle moves the cumbrous scene;
Presents no objects, tender or profound,
But spreads its cold unmeaning gloom around.

When woes are feign'd, how ill such forms appear,

And oh! how needless when the woe's sincere!

Slow to the vault they come with heavy tread,
Bending beneath the lady and her lead;

A case of elm surrounds that ponderous chest,
Close on that case the crimson velvet's press'd;

Ungen'rous this, that to the worm denies
With niggard caution his appointed prize;

For now, e'er yet he works his tedious way
Thro' cloth, and wood, and metal, to his prey,

That prey dissolving shall a mass remain [dain.
That fancy loathes, and worms themselves dis-

But see, the master-mourner makes his way
To end his office for the coffin'd clay,

Pleas'd that our rustic men and minds behold
His plate like silver, and his studs like gold;

As they approach to spell the age, the name,
And all the titles of th' illustrious dame:—

This as (my duty done) some scholar read,
A village father look'd disdain, and said—

“ Away, my friends! why take such pains to know

What some brave marble soon in church shall
show?

Where not alone her gracious name shall stand,
But how she liv'd the blessing of the land;

How much we all deplor'd the noble dead,
What groans we utter'd, and what tears we shed;

Tears true as those which in the sleepy eyes
Of weeping cherubs on the stone shall rise;

Tears true as those, which, ere she found her grave,

The noble lady to our sorrows gave.”

§ 162. Funeral of an ancient Maiden. CRABBE.

Down by the church-way walk, and where the brook

Winds round the chancel like a shepherd's crook,
In that small house, with those great pales before,

Where jasmine trails on either side the door,
Where those dark shrubs that now grow wild at

will,
Were clipt in form, and tantaliz'd with skill;

Where cockles blanch'd, and pebbles neatly
spread,

Form'd shining borders for the larkspur bed;
There liv'd a lady wise, austere, and nice,

Who showed her virtue by her scorn of vice:
In the dear fashions of her youth, she dress'd,

A pea-green joseph was her fav'rite vest,
Erect she stood, she walk'd with stately mien,

Tight was her length of stays, and she was tall and lean.

There long she liv'd in maiden state immur'd
From looks of love, and treacherous man se-

cur'd;

Though evil fame (but that was long before)
Had blown her dubious blast at Catharine's door.

A captain Huther, rich from India came,
And though a cousin call'd, it touch'd her fame;

Her annual stipend rose from his behest,
And all the long-priz'd treasures she possess'd:

If aught like joy a while appear'd to stay
In that stern face, and chase those frowns away,

'Twas when her treasures she dispos'd for view,
And heard the praises to their splendor due;

Silks beyond price, so rich they'd stand alone,
And diamonds blazing on the buckled zone;

Rows of rare pearls by curious workmen set,
And bracelets fair, in box of glossy jet:

Bright polish'd amber, precious from its size
Or forms, the fairest fancy could devise;

Her drawers of cedar, shut with secret springs,
Conceal'd the watch of gold and rubied rings;

Letters, long proofs of love, and verses fine,
Round the pink'd rims of Crispin valentine.

Her china closet, cause of daily care,
For woman's wonder held her pencil'd ware;

That pictur'd wealth of China and Japan,
Like its cold mistress, shunn'd the eye of man.

Her neat small room, adorn'd with maiden taste,

A clipt French puppy, first of fav'rites, grac'd;
A parrot next, but dead and stuff'd with art

(For Poll, when living, lost his lady's heart,
And then his life! for he was heard to speak

Such frightful words as ting'd his lady's cheek);
Unhappy bird! who had no power to prove,

Save by such speech, his gratitude and love;
A grey old cat his whiskers lick'd beside,

A type of sadness in the house of pride:
The polish'd surface of an India chest,

A glassy globe in frame of ivory prest,
Where swam two finny creatures, one of gold,

Of silver one, both beauteous to behold:
All these were form'd the guiding taste to suit,

The beasts well-manner'd, and the fishes mute.
A widow'd aunt was there, compell'd by need

The nymph to flatter, and her tribe to feed;
Who, veiling well her scorn, endur'd the clog

Mute as the fish, and fawning as the dog.

As years increas'd, these treasures, her delight
Arose in value in their owner's sight:

A miser knows that, view it as he will,
A guinea kept, is but a guinea still;

And so he puts it to its proper use,
That something more this guinea may produce:

But silks and rings in the possessor's eyes
The oftener seen, the more in value rise,

And thus are wisely hoarded to bestow
On pride that governs, pleasure that will grow:

But what avail'd their worth, if worth had they,
In the sad summer of her slow decay?

Then we beheld her turn an anxious look
From trunks and chests, and fix it on her book,

A rich-bound book of prayer the captain gave (Some princess had it, or was said to have),

And then once more on all her stores look round,
And draw a sigh so piteous and profound,

That told, “ Alas! how hard from thee to part,
And for new hopes and habits form the heart:

What shall I do (she cried), my peace of mind
To gain in dying, and to die resign'd?”

Here we returned—"These baubles cast aside,
Nor give thy God a rival in thy pride;
Thy closet shut, and ope thy kitchen door,
There own thy failings—here invite the poor;
A friend of mammon let thy bounty make,
For widows' prayers thy vanities forsake,
And let the hungry of thy pride partake;
Then shall thy inward eye with joy survey
The angel Mercy tempering Death's delay."

Alas! 'twas hard; the treasures still had charms,

- Hope still its flattery, sickness its alarms;
Still was the same unsettled cloudy view,
And the same plaintive cry "What shall I do?"

Nor change appear'd: for when her race was run,

Doubtful we all exclaim'd, "What has been done?"

Apart she liv'd, and still she lies alone;
Yon earthly heap awaits the flatt'ring stone,
On which invention shall be long employ'd
To show the various worth of Catharine Lloyd.

§ 163. Funeral of Isaac Ashford, a virtuous Peasant. CRABBE.

NOBLE he was, condemning all things mean,
His truth unquestion'd, and his soul serene;
Of no man's presence Isaac felt afraid;
At no man's question Isaac look'd dismay'd:
Shame knew him not, he dreaded no disgrace,
Truth, simple truth, was written in his face;
Yet while the serious thought his soul approv'd,
Cheerful he seem'd, and gentleness he lov'd:
To bliss domestic he his heart resign'd,
And with the firmest had the fondest mind.
Were others joyful, he look'd smiling on,
And gave allowance when he needed none;
Good he refus'd with future ill to buy,
Nor knew a joy that caus'd reflection's sigh;
A friend to virtue, his unclouded breast
No envy stung, no jealousy distress'd;
Bane of the poor! it wounds their weaker mind
To miss one favor which their neighbours find.
Yet far was he from stoic pride remov'd,
He felt humanely, and he warmly lov'd.
I mark'd his action when his infant died,
And his old neighbour for offence was tried;
The still tears stealing down that furrow'd cheek
Spoke pity plainer than the tongue can speak.
If pride were his, 'twas not their vulgar pride
Who, in their base contempt, the great deride;
Nor pride in learning, though my clerk agreed,
If fate should call him, Ashford might succeed;
Nor pride in rustic skill, although he knew,
None his superior, and his equals few:
But if that spirit in his soul had place,
It was the jealous pride that shuns disgrace;
A pride in honest fame, by virtue gain'd,
In sturdy boys to virtuous labors train'd;
Pride in the power that guards his country's coast,
And all that Englishmen enjoy and boast;
Pride in a life that slander's tongue defy'd;
In fact, a noble passion, misnam'd pride.

He had no party's rage, no sect'ry's whim,
Christian and country was all with him:
True to his church he came, no Sunday shower
Kept him at home in that important hour;

Nor his firm feet could one persuading sect,
By the strong glare of their new-light, direct;
On hope in mine own sober light I gaze,
But should be blind and lose it in your blaze.

In times severe, when many a sturdy swain
Felt it his pride, his comfort, to complain;
Isaac their wants would soothe, his own would hide,

And feel in that his comfort and his pride.

At length he found, when seventy years were run,

His strength departed, and his labor done;
When, save his honest fame, he kept no more,
But lost his wife, and saw his children poor:
'Twas then a spark of—(say not discontent),
Struck on his mind, and thus he gave it vent:
"Kind are your laws, 'tis not to be deny'd,
That in yon house for ruin'd age provide;
And they are just; when young we give you all,
And then for comforts in our weakness call;
Why then this proud reluctance to be fed,
To join your poor, and eat the parish bread?
But yet I linger, loath with him to feed,
Who gains his plenty by the sons of need;
He who by contract all your paupers took
And gauges stomachs with an anxious look:
On some old master I could well depend;
See him with joy, and thank him as a friend;
But ill on him who doles the day's supply,
And counts our chances who at night may die.
Yet help me Heaven! and let me not complain
Of what befalls me, but the fate sustain."

Such were his thoughts, and so resign'd he grew,

Daily he plac'd the work-house in his view;
But came not there, for sudden was his fate,
He dropp'd, expiring at his cottage gate.

I feel his absence in the hours of prayer,
And view his seat, and sigh for Isaac there:
I see no more those white locks thinly spread
Round the bald polish of that honor'd head;
No more that awful glance on playful wight
Compell'd to kneel, and tremble at the sight,
To fold his fingers all in dread the while,
Till Mister Ashford soften'd to a smile;
No more that meek and suppliant look in prayer,
Nor the pure faith, to give it force, are there;
But he is blest, and I lament no more
A wise good man, contented to be poor.

§ 164. An Epistle addressed to Sir Thomas Hanmer, on his Edition of Shakspeare's Works. COLLINS.

WHILE, born to bring the Muse's happier days,

A patriot's hand protects a poet's lays;
While nurs'd by you, she sees her myrtles bloom,

Green and unwither'd, o'er his honor'd tomb;
Excuse her doubts, if yet she fears to tell
What secret transports in her bosom swell;
With conscious awe she hears the critic's fame,
And blushing, hides her wreath at Shakspeare's name.

Hard was the lot those injur'd strains endur'd,
Unown'd by science, and by years obscur'd.

Fair Fancy wept; and echoing sighs confess'd
A fix'd despair in every tuneful breast.

Not with more grief th' afflicted swains appear,
When wintry winds deform the plenteous year;
When lingering frosts the ruin'd seats invade,
Where Peace resorted, and the Graces play'd.

Each rising art by just gradation moves,
Toil builds on toil, and age on age improves:
The Muse alone unequal dealt her rage,
And grac'd with noblest pomp her earliest stage.
Preserv'd through time, the speaking scenes in part

Each changeful wish of Phædra's tortur'd heart:
Or paint the curse that mark'd the Theban's
reign*;

A bed incestuous, and a father slain:

With kind concern our pitying eyes o'erflow,
Trace the sad tale, and own another's woe.

To Rome remov'd, with wit secure to please,
The comic sisters keep their native ease.
With jealous fear declining Greece beheld
Her own Menander's art almost excell'd!
But every Muse essay'd to raise in vain
Some labor'd rival of her tragic strain;
Ilissus' laurels, though transferr'd with toil,
Droop'd their fair leaves, nor knew th' unfriendly soil.

As arts expir'd, resistless Dulness rose;
Goths, priests, or Vandals—all were learning's
foes,

Till † Julius first recall'd each exil'd maid,
And Cosmo own'd them in th' Etrurian shade.
Then, deeply skill'd in love's engaging theme,
The soft Provençal pass'd to Arno's stream:
With graceful ease the wanton lyre he strung,
Sweet flow'd the lays—but love was all he sung.
The gay description could not fail to move;
For, led by nature, all are friends to love.

But heaven, still various in its works, decreed
The perfect boast of time should last succeed.
The beauteous union must appear at length
Of Tuscan fancy and Athenian strength;
One greater Muse Eliza's reign adorn,
And e'en a Shakspeare to her fame be born!

Yet ah! so bright her morning's opening ray,
In vain our Britain hop'd an equal day!
No second growth the western isle could bear,
At once exhausted with too rich a year.
Too nicely Jonson knew the critic's part;
Nature in him was almost lost in art.
Of softer mould the gentle Fletcher came,
The next in order, as the next in name:
With pleas'd attention 'midst his scenes we find
Each glowing thought that warms the female
mind;

Each melting sigh, and every tender tear,
The lover's wishes, and the virgin's fear.
His ‡ every strain the Smiles and Graces own:
But stronger Shakspeare felt for man alone:

Drawn by his pen, our ruder passions stand
Th' unrivall'd picture of his early hand.

With § gradual steps, and slow, exacter France
Saw Art's fair empire o'er her shores advance;
By length of toil a bright perfection knew,
Correctly bold and just in all she drew.
Till late Corneille, with Lucan's || spirit fir'd, Breath'd the free strain, as Rome and he in-
spir'd;

And classic judgement gain'd to sweet Racine
The temperate strength of Maro's chaster line.

But wider far the British laurel spread,
And wreaths less artful crown our poet's head.
Yet he alone to every scene could give
Th' historian's truth, and bid the manners live.
Wak'd at his call, I view with glad surprise
Majestic forms of mighty monarchs rise.
There Henry's strumpets spread their loud alarms,
And laurell'd conquest waits her hero's arms.
Here gentler Edward claims a pitying sigh,
Scarce born to honors, and so soon to die!
Yet shall thy throne, unhappy infant, bring
No beam of comfort to the guilty king:
The time shall come when Glo'ster's heart shall bleed,

In life's last hours, with horror of the deed:
When dreary visions shall at last present
Thy vengeful image in the midnight tent;
Thy hand unseen the secret death shall bear,
Blunt the weak sword, and break th' oppressive spear.

Where'er we turn, by fancy charm'd, we find
Some sweet illusion of the cheated mind.
Oft, wild of wing, she calls the soul to rove
With humbler nature, in the rural grove;
Where swains contented own the quiet scene,
And twilight fairies tread the circled green:
Dress'd by her hand, the woods and valleys
smile,

And spring diffusive decks th' enchanted isle.

O, more than all in powerful genius blest,
Come, take thine empire o'er the willing
breast!

Whate'er the wounds this youthful heart shall feel,

Thy songs support me, and thy morals heal!
There every thought the poet's warmth may raise,

There native music dwells in all the lays.

O, might some verse with happiest skill persuade

Expressive picture to adopt thine aid,
What wondrous draughts might rise from every page!

What other Raphaels charm a distant age!

Methinks e'en now I view some free design,
Where breathing nature lives in every line:
Chaste and subdu'd the modest lights decay,
Steal into shades, and mildly melt away.

* The Œdipus of Sophocles.

† Julius II. the immediate predecessor of Leo X.

‡ The characters are thus distinguished by Mr. Dryden.

§ About the time of Shakspeare, the poet Hardy was in great repute in France. He wrote, according to Fontenelle, six hundred plays. The French poets after him applied themselves in general to the correct improvement of the stage, which was almost totally disregarded by those of our own country, Jonson excepted.

|| The favorite author of the elder Corneille.

—And see, where Antony*, in tears approv'd,
Guards the pale relics of the chief he lov'd:
O'er the cold corse the warrior seems to bend,
Deep sunk in grief, and mourns his murder'd friend!

Still as they press, he calls on all around,
Lifts the torn robe, and points the bleeding
wound.

But who is he† whose brows exalted bear
A wrath impatient, and a fiercer air?
Awake to all that injur'd worth can feel,
On his own Rome he turns th' avenging steel.
Yet shall not war's insatiate fury fall
(So Heaven ordains it) on the destin'd wall.
See the fond mother, 'midst the plaintive train,
Hang on his knees, and prostrate on the plain!
Touch'd to the soul, in vain he strives to hide
The son's affection in the Roman's pride:
O'er all the man conflicting passions rise,
Rage grasps the sword, while pity melts the eyes.

Thus, generous Critic, as thy bard inspires,
The sister arts shall nurse their drooping fires;
Each from his scenes her stores alternate bring,
Blend the fair tints, or wake the vocal string:
Those Sibyl-leaves, the sport of every wind,
(For poets ever were a careless kind)
By thee dispos'd, no farther toil demand,
But, just to nature, own thy forming hand.

So spread o'er Greece, th' harmonious whole unknown,

E'en Homer's numbers charm'd by parts alone;
Their own Ulysses scarce had wander'd more,
By winds and waters, cast on every shore:
When rais'd by fate, some former Hanmer
join'd

Each beauteous image of the boundless mind;
And bade, like thee, his Athens ever claim
A fond alliance with the Poet's name.

§ 165. Dirge in Cymbeline, sung by Guiderius and Arviragus over Fidele, supposed to be dead. COLLINS.

To fair Fidele's grassy tomb
Soft maids and village hinds shall bring
Each opening sweet of earliest bloom,
And rifle all the breathing Spring.

No wailing ghost shall dare appear
To vex with shrieks this quiet grove;
But shepherd lads assemble here,
And melting virgins own their love.

No wither'd witch shall here be seen,
No goblins lead their nightly crew;
The female fays shall haunt the green,
And dress thy grave with pearly dew.

The red-breast oft at evening hours
Shall kindly lend his little aid,
With hoary moss, and gather'd flow'rs,
To deck the ground where thou art laid.

|| Mr. Thomson was buried in Richmond church.

¶ Mr. Thomson resided in the neighbourhood of Richmond some time before his death.

When howling winds, and beating rain,
In tempests shake thy sylvan cell;
Or 'midst the chase on every plain,
The tender thought on thee shall dwell:

Each lonely scene shall thee restore;
For thee the tear be duly shed;
Belov'd, till life can charm no more;
And mourn'd, till Pity's self be dead.

§ 166. Ode on the Death of Mr. Thomson.
COLLINS.

The Scene of the following Stanzas is supposed to lie on the Thames, near Richmond.

In yonder grave a Druid lies,
Where slowly winds the stealing wave:
The year's best sweets shall duteous rise
To deck its Poet's sylvan grave.

In yon deep bed of whispering reeds
His airy harp§ shall now be laid;
That he whose heart in sorrow bleeds,
May love through life the soothing shade.

Then maids and youths shall linger here,
And, while its sounds at distance swell,
Shall sadly seem in Pity's ear
To hear the woodland pilgrim's knell.

Remembrance oft shall haunt the shore
When Thames in summer wreaths is drest,
And oft suspend the dashing oar
To bid his gentle spirit rest!

And oft as Ease and Health retire
To breezy lawn, or forest deep,
The friend shall view yon whitening|| spire,
And 'mid the varied landscape weep:

But thou, who own'st that earthly bed,
Ah! what will every dirge avail!
Or tears, which Love and Pity shed,
That mourn beneath the gliding sail!

Yet lives there one whose heedless eye
Shall scorn thy pale shrine glimmering near?
With him, sweet bard, may Fancy die,
And Joy desert the blooming year!

But thou, lorn stream, whose sullen tide
No sedge-crown'd sisters now attend,
Now waft me from the green hill's side,
Whose cold turf hides the buried friend!

And see, the fairy valleys fade;
Dun night has veil'd the solemn view;
Yet once again, dear parted shade,
Meek nature's child, again adieu!

The genial meads assign'd to bless
Thy life¶, shall mourn thy early doom!
There hinds and shepherd girls shall dress
With simple hands thy rural tomb.

† Coriolanus.

Long, long, thy stone and pointed clay
Shall melt the musing Briton's eyes;
O vales and wild woods, shall he say,
In yonder grave your Druid lies!

§ 167. Verses written on a Paper which contained a Piece of Bride Cake.

COLLINS.

YE curious hands, that, hid from vulgar eyes,
By search profane shall find this hallow'd
cake,

With virtue's awe forbear the sacred prize,
Nor dare a theft, for love and pity's sake!

This precious relic, form'd by magic pow'r,
Beneath the shepherd's haunted pillow laid,
Was meant by love to charm the silent hour,
The secret present of a matchless maid.

The Cyprian queen, at Hymen's fond request,
Each nice ingredient chose with happiest art;
Fears, sighs, and wishes of th' enamour'd breast,
And pains that please, are mix'd in every part.

With rosy hand the spicy fruit she brought,
From Paphian hills, and fair Cytherea's isle;
And temper'd sweet with these the melting
thought,

The kiss ambrosial, and the yielding smile;
Ambiguous looks, that scorn and yet relent;
Denials mild, and firm unalter'd truth;
Reluctant pride, and amorous faint consent,
And meeting ardours, and exulting youth.

Sleep, wayward god, hath sworn, while these
remain,

With flattering dreams to dry his nightly
tear;

And cheerful Hope, so oft invoc'd in vain,
With fairy songs shall soothe his pensive ear.

If, bound by vows to friendship's gentle side,
And fond of soul, thou hop'st an equal grace,
If youth or maid thy joys and griefs divide,
O much entreated, leave this fatal place.

Sweet Peace, who long hath shunn'd my plaintive day,

Consents at length to bring me short delight;
Thy careless steps may scare her doves away,
And Grief with raven note usurp the night.

§ 168. To a Mouse, on turning her up in her Nest with the Plough, November, 1785.

BURNS.

WEE, sleekit, cowrin, tim'rous beastie,
O, what a panic's in thy breastie!
Thou need na start away sae hasty,
Wi' bickering brattle!

I wad be laith to rin an' chase thee,
Wi' murd'ring patte!

I'm truly sorry man's dominion,
Has broken nature's social union,
An' justifies that ill opinion,
Which makes thee startle
At me, thy poor earth-born companion,
An' fellow-mortal.

I doubt na, whyles, but thou mayst thieve:
What then? poor beastie, thou maun live!
A diamen-icker in a thrave

'S a sma' request;
I'll get a blessing wi' the lave,
An' never miss't!

Thy wee bit housie, too, in ruin!
Its silly wa's the wins are strewing:
An' naething, now, to big a new ane
O' foggage green!
An' bleak December's wind ensuing,
Baith snell and keen!

Thou saw the field laid bare and waste,
An' weary winter coming fast,
An' cozie here, beneath the blast,
Thou thought to dwell,
Till, crash! the cruel coulter past,
Out thro' thy cell.

That wee bit heap o' leaves an' stibble!
Has cost thee monie a weary nibble!
Now thou's turn'd out, for a' thy trouble,
Baith house or hald,
To thole the winter's sleety dribble,
An' cranreuch cauld!

But, Mousie, thou art no thy lane,
In proving foresight may be vain:
The best-laid schemes o' mice an' men
Gang aft a-gley,
An' lea'e us nought but grief an' pain
For promis'd joy!

Still thou art blest, compar'd wi' me!
The present only toucheth thee:
But, och! I backward cast my e'e
On prospects drear!
An' forward, though I canna see,
I guess an' fear.

§ 169. To a Mountain Daisy, on turning one down with the Plough, in April, 1786.

BURNS.

WEE, modest, crimson-tipped flow'r,
Thou's met me in an evil hour;
For I maun crush amang the stoure
Thy slender stem:
To spare thee now is past my pow'r,
Thou bonie gem!

Alas! its no thy neebor sweet,
The bonie lark, companion meet!
Bending thee 'mang the dewy weet!
Wi' spreckl'd breast,
When upwards springing, blythe, to greet
The purpling east.

Could blew the bitter biting north
Upon thy early humble birth;
Yet cheerfully thou glinted forth
Amid the storm,
Scarce rear'd above the parent-earth
Thy tender form.

The flaunting flow'rs our gardens yield,
High sheltering woods an' wa's maun shield;

But thou, beneath the random bield
 O' clod or stane,
 Adorns the histie stibble field,
 Unseen, alane.

There in thy scanty mantle clad,
 Thy snawie bosom sunward spread,
 Thou lifts thy unassuming head
 In humble guise;
 But now the share up tears thy bed,
 And low thou lies!

Such is the fate of artless maid,
 Sweet flowret of the rural shade,
 By love's simplicity betray'd,
 And guiltless trust,
 Till she, like thee, all soil'd is laid
 Low i' the dust.

Such is the fate of simple bard,
 On life's rough ocean luckless starr'd!
 Unskilful he to note the card
 Of prudent lore,
 Till billows rage, and gales blow hard,
 And whelm him o'er!

Such fate to suffering Worth is giv'n,
 Who long with wants and woes has striv'n,
 By human pride or cunning driv'n
 To Mis'ry's brink,
 Till wrench'd of ev'ry stay but Heaven,
 He ruin'd sink!

E'en thou who mourn'st the Daisy's fate,
 That fate is thine—no distant date:
 Stern ruin's plough-share drives elate
 Full on thy bloom;
 Till, crush'd beneath the furrow's weight,
 Shall be thy doom!

§ 170. An Essay upon unnatural Flights in Poetry. LANDSDOWNE.

As when some image of a charming face,
 In living paint, an artist tries to trace,
 He carefully consults each beauteous line,
 Adjusting to his object his design;
 We praise the piece, and give the painter fame,
 But as the bright resemblance speaks the dame:
 Poets are limners of another kind,
 To copy out ideas in the mind;
 Words are the paint by which their thoughts are shown,
 And Nature is their object to be drawn:
 The written picture we applaud or blame
 But as the just proportions are the same.
 Who, driven with ungovernable fire,
 Or void of art, beyond these bounds aspire,
 Gigantic forms and monstrous births alone Produce, which Nature shock'd disdains to own.

By true reflection I would see my face;
 Why brings the fool a magnifying glass?
 "But poetry in fiction takes delight,
 And mounting in bold figures out of sight,
 Leaves truth behind in her audacious flight:
 Fables and metaphors that always lie,
 And rash hyperboles that soar so high,
 And every ornament of verse must die."

Mistake me not: no figures I exclude,
 And but forbid intemperance, not food.
 Who would with careless happy fiction frame,
 So mimics truth, it looks the very same;
 Not rais'd to force, or feign'd in Nature's scorn,
 But meant to grace, illustrate, and adorn.
 Important truths still let your fables hold,
 And moral mysteries with art unfold:
 Ladies and beaux to please is all the task;
 But the sharp critic will instruction ask.
 As veils transparent cover, but not hide,
 Such metaphors appear, when right applied;
 When thro' the phrase we plainly see the sense,
 Truth with such obvious meanings will dispense.
 The reader what is reason's due believes,
 Nor can we call that false which not deceives:
 Hyperboles, so daring and so bold,
 Disdaining bounds, are yet by rules controll'd;
 Above the clouds, but yet within our sight,
 They mount with Truth, and make a tow'ring
 flight;
 Presenting things impossible to view,
 They wander through incredible to true.
 Falsehoods thus mix'd like metals are refin'd;
 And Truth, like silver, leaves the dross behind.
 Thus Poetry has ample space to soar,
 Nor needs forbidden regions to explore;
 Such vaunts as his, who can with patience read,
 Who thus describes his hero when he's dead—
 "In heat of action slain, yet scorns to fall,
 But still maintains the war, and fights at—
 All?"

The noisy culverin, o'ercharg'd, lets fly,
 And bursts, unaiming, in the rended sky;
 Such frantic flights are like a madman's dream,
 And nature suffers in the wild extreme.
 The captive cannibal, oppress'd with chains,
 Yet braves his foes, reviles, provokes, disdains;
 Of nature fierce, untameable, and proud,
 He bids defiance to the gaping crowd;
 And spent at last, and speechless, as he lies,
 With fiery glances mocks their rage, and dies.
 This is the utmost stretch that nature can,
 And all beyond is fulsome, false and vain.
 The Roman wit, who impiously divides
 His hero and his gods to different sides,
 I would condemn, but that in spite of sense,
 The admiring world still stands in his defence:
 The gods permitting traitors to succeed,
 Become not parties in an impious deed;
 And by the tyrant's murder, we may find
 That Cato and the gods were of a mind.
 Thus forcing truth with such preposterous
 praise,

Our characters we lessen when we'd raise:
 Like castles built by magic art in air,
 That vanish at approach, such thoughts appear;
 But, rais'd on truth by some judicious hand,
 As on a rock they shall for ages stand.
 Our king return'd, and banish'd peace restor'd,
 The Muse ran mad to see her exil'd lord;
 On the crack'd stage the Bedlam heroes roar'd,
 And scarce could speak one reasonable word:
 Dryden himself, to please a frantic age,
 Was forc'd to let his judgement stoop to rage:
 To a wild audience he conform'd his voice,
 Compli'd to custom, but not err'd thro' choice.

Deem then the people's, not the writer's sin,
Almansor's rage, and rants of Maximin;
That fury spent in each elaborate piece,
He vies for fame with ancient Rome and Greece.
Roscommon first, then Mulgrave rose, like
light,

To clear our darkness, and to guide our flight:
With steady judgement, and in lofty sounds,
They gave us patterns, and they set us bounds.
The Stagyrite and Horace laid aside:
Inform'd by them, we need no foreign guide.
Who seek from poetry a lasting name,
May from their lessons learn the road to fame;
But let the bold adventurer be sure
That every line the test of truth endure;
On this foundation may the fabric rise,
Firm and unshaken, till it touch the skies.
From pulpits banish'd, from the court, from
love,

Abandon'd Truth seeks shelter in the grove:
Cherish, ye Muses, the forsaken fair,
And take into your train this beauteous wanderer.

§ 171. To Mr. Spence, prefixed to the Essay on Pope's Odyssey. PITT.

'Tis done—restor'd by thy immortal pen,
The critic's noble name revives again:
Once more that great, that injur'd name we see
Shine forth alike in Addison and thee.

Like curs, our critics haunt the poet's feast,
And feed on scraps refus'd by every guest;
From the old Thracian* dog they learn'd the
way

To snarl in want, and grumble o'er their prey:
As though they grudg'd themselves the joys they feel,

Vex'd to be charm'd, and pleas'd against their
will.

Such their inverted taste, that we expect
For faults their thanks, for beauties their neglect.
So the fell snake rejects the fragrant flow'rs,
And every poison of the field devours.

Like bold Longinus of immortal fame,
You read your poet with a poet's flame;
With his, your gen'rous raptures still aspire;
The critic kindles when the bard's on fire.
But when some lame, some limping line demands

The friendly succour of your healing hands;
The feather of your pen drops balm around,
And plays and tickles, while it cures the
wound.

While Pope's immortal labor we survey,
We stand all dazzled with excess of day;
Blind with the glorious blaze—to vulgar sight
'Twas one bright mass of undistinguish'd light;
But, like the tow'ring eagle, you alone
Discern'd the spots and splendors of the sun.

To point out faults, yet never to offend;
To play the critic, yet preserve the friend:
A life well spent, that never lost a day;
An easy spirit, innocently gay;

A strict integrity, devoid of art;
The sweetest manners, and sincerest heart;
A soul, where depth of sense and fancy meet;
A judgement brighten'd by the beams of wit—
Were ever yours: be what you were before,
Be still yourself; the world can ask no more.

§ 172. The Inquiry. Written in the last Century.

AMONGST the myrtles as I walk'd,
Love and my sighs thus intertalk'd:
"Tell me," said I, in deep distress,
"Where may I find my shepherdess?"
"Thou fool," said Love, "know'st thou not this?"

In every thing that's good, she is;
In yonder tulip go and seek,
There thou mayst find her lip, her cheek;
In yon enamell'd pansy by,
There thou shalt have her curious eye;
In bloom of peach, in rosy bud,
There wave the streamers of her blood;
In brightest lilies that there stand,
The emblems of her whiter hand;
In yonder rising hill there smell
Such sweets as in her bosom dwell:
'Tis true," said he. And thereupon
I went to pluck them one by one,
To make of parts an union;
But on a sudden all was gone.
With that I stopp'd. Said Love, "These be,
Fond man, resemblances of thee;
And as these flow'rs thy joy shall die,
E'en in the twinkling of an eye;
And all thy hopes of her shall wither,
Like these short sweets that knit together."

§ 173. *The Diverting History of John Gilpin; showing how he went farther than he intended,
and came safe home again.* COWPER.

JOHN GILPIN was a citizen
Of credit and renown,
A train-band captain eke was he
Of famous London town.

John Gilpin's spouse said to her dear,
Though wedded we have been
These twice ten tedious years, yet we
No holiday have seen.

To-morrow is our wedding-day,
And we will then repair
Unto the Bell at Edmonton,
All in a chaise and pair,

My sister and my sister's child,
Myself and children three,
Will fill the chaise, so you must ride
On horseback after we.

* Zoilus, so called by the ancients.

He soon replied, I do admire
Of woman kind but one ;
And you are she, my dearest dear,
Therefore it shall be done.

I am a linen-draper bold,
As all the world doth know,
And my good friend the calender
Will lend his horse to go.

Quoth Mistress Gilpin, That's well said ;
And, for that wine is dear,
We will be furnish'd with our own,
Which is both bright and clear.

John Gilpin kiss'd his loving wife ;
O'erjoy'd was he to find
That, though on pleasure she was bent,
She had a frugal mind.

The morning came, the chaise was brought,
But yet was not allow'd
To drive up to the door, lest all
Should say that she was proud.

So three doors off the chaise was stay'd,
Where they did all get in,
Six precious souls, and all agog
To dash through thick and thin.

Smack went the whip, round went the wheels,
Were never folk so glad ;
The stones did rattle underneath
As if Cheapside were mad.

John Gilpin at his horse's side
Seiz'd fast the flowing mane :
And up he got in haste to ride,
But soon came down again :

For saddle-tree scarce reach'd had he,
His journey to begin,
When turning round his head, he saw
Three customers come in.

So down he came ; for loss of time,
Although it griev'd him sore,
Yet loss of pence, full well he knew,
Would trouble him much more.

'Twas long before the customers
Were suited to their mind ;
When Betty screaming came down stairs,
" The wine is left behind ! "

Good lack ! quoth he—yet bring it me,
My leathern belt likewise,
In which I bear my trusty sword
When I do exercise.

Now Mistress Gilpin, careful soul !
Had two stone bottles found,
To hold the liquor that she lov'd,
And keep it safe and sound.

Each bottle had a curling ear,
Through which the belt he drew,
And hung a bottle on each side,
To make his balance true ;

Then over all, that he might be
Equipp'd from top to toe,
His long red cloak, well brush'd and neat,
He manfully did throw.

Now see him mounted once again
Upon his nimble steed,
Full slowly pacing o'er the stones
With caution and good heed.

But finding soon a smoother road
Beneath his well-shod feet,
The snorting beast began to trot,
Which gall'd him in his seat.

So, fair and softly, John he cried,
But John he cried in vain ;
That trot became a gallop soon,
In spite of curb and rein.

So stooping down, as needs he must
Who cannot sit upright,
He grasp'd the mane with both his hands,
And eke with all his might.

His horse, who never in that sort
Had handled been before,
What thing upon his back had got
Did wonder more and more.

Away went Gilpin, neck or nought,
Away went hat and wig ;
He little dreamt, when he set out,
Of running such a rig.

The wind did blow, the cloak did fly,
Like streamer long and gay,
Till, loop and button failing both,
At last it flew away.

Then might all people well discern
The bottles he had slung ;
A bottle swinging at each side,
As hath been said or sung.

The dogs did bark, the children scream'd,
Up flew the windows all :
And ev'ry soul cried out, Well done !
As loud as he could bawl.

Away went Gilpin—who but he ;
His fame soon spread around—
He carries weight ! he rides a race !
'Tis for a thousand pound.

And still as fast as he drew near
'Twas wonderful to view
How in a trice the turnpike-men
Their gates wide open threw.

And now as he went bowing down
His reeking head full low,
The bottles twain behind his back
Were shatter'd at a blow.

Down ran the wine into the road,
Most piteous to be seen,
Which made his horse's flanks to smoke
As they had basted been.

But still he seem'd to carry weight,
With leathern girdle brac'd ;
For all might see the bottles' necks
Still dangling at his waist.

Thus all through merry Islington
These gambols he did play,
And till he came unto the Wash
Of Edmonton so gay.

And there he threw the wash about
On both sides of the way,
Just like unto a trundling mop,
Or a wild-goose at play.

At Edmonton his loving wife
From balcony espied
Her tender husband, wond'ring much
To see how he did ride.

Stop, stop, John Gilpin! here's the house—
They all at once did cry:
The dinner waits, and we are tir'd:
Said Gilpin—So am I.

But yet his horse was not a whit
Inclin'd to tarry there;
For why? his owner had a house
Full ten miles off, at Ware.

So like an arrow swift he flew,
Shot by an archer strong;
So did he fly—which brings me to
The middle of my song.

Away went Gilpin, out of breath,
And sore against his will,
Till at his friend's the calender's
His horse at last stood still.

The calender, amaz'd to see
His neighbour in such trim,
Laid down his pipe, flew to the gate,
And thus accosted him:

What news? what news? your tidings tell,
Tell me you must and shall—
Say why bare-headed you are come,
Or why you come at all!

Now Gilpin had a pleasant wit,
And lov'd a timely joke;
And thus unto the calender
In merry guise he spoke:

I came because your horse would come,
And, if I well forebode,
My hat and wig will soon be here,
'They are upon the road.

The calender, right glad to find
His friend in merry pin,
Return'd him not a single word,
But to the house went in.

When straight he came with hat and wig,
A wig that flow'd behind,
A hat not much the worse for wear,
Each comely in its kind.

He held them up, and in his turn
Thus show'd his ready wit:
My head is twice as big as yours,
'They therefore needs must fit.

But let me scrape the dirt away
That hangs upon your face;
And stop and eat, for well you may
Be in a hungry case.

Said John, It is my wedding day;
And all the world would stare,

If wife should dine at Edmonton,
And I should dine at Ware.

So turning to his horse, he said,
I am in haste to dine:
'Twas for your pleasure you came here,
You shall go back for mine.

Ah, luckless speech, and bootless boast!
For which he paid full dear;
For while he spake, a braying ass
Did sing most loud and clear:

Whereat his horse did snort, as he
Had heard a lion roar;
And gallop'd off with all his might,
As he had done before.

Away went Gilpin, and away
Went Gilpin's hat and wig;
He lost them sooner than at first,
For why? they were too big.

Now Mistress Gilpin, when she saw
Her husband posting down
Into the country far away,
She pull'd out half a crown:

And thus unto the youth she said
That drove them to the Bell,
This shall be yours when you bring back
My husband safe and well.

The youth did ride, and soon did meet
John coming back amain,
Whom in a trice he tried to stop
By catching at his rein;

But not performing what he meant,
And gladly would have done,
The frightened steed he frightened more,
And made him faster run.

Away went Gilpin, and away
Went post-boy at his heels,
The post-boy's horse right glad to miss
The lumb'ring of the wheels.

Six gentlemen upon the road
Thus seeing Gilpin fly,
With post-boy scamp'ring in the rear,
They rais'd the hue and cry:

Stop thief! stop thief!—a highwayman!
Not one of them was mute;
And all and each that pass'd that way
Did join in the pursuit.

And now the turnpike gates again
Flew open in short space;
The toll-men thinking, as before,
That Gilpin rode a race.

And so he did, and won it too,
For he got first to town,
Nor stopp'd till where he first got up
He did again get down.

Now let us sing, Long live the king,
And Gilpin, long live he;
And when he next doth ride abroad,
May I be there to see!

§ 174. *An Evening Contemplation in a College, in Imitation of Gray's Elegy in a Country
Church-yard.* DUNCOMBE.

THE curfew tolls the hour of closing gates;
With jarring sounds the porter turns the key;
Then in his dreary mansion slumb'ring waits,
And slowly, sternly, quits it though for me.

Now shine the spires beneath the paly moon,
And through the cloisters peace and silence
reign;

Save where some fidler scrapes a drowsy tune,
Or copious bowls inspire a jovial strain;

Save that in yonder cobweb-mantled room,
Where sleeps a student in profound repose,
Oppress'd with ale, wide echoes thro' the gloom
The droning music of his vocal nose.

Within those walls, where through the glimmering shade

Appear the pamphlets in a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow bed till morning laid,
The peaceful fellows of the college sleep.

The tinkling bell proclaiming early pray'rs,
The noisy servants rattling o'er their head,
The calls of business, and domestic cares,
Ne'er rouse these sleepers from their downy
bed.

No chattering females crowd their social fire,
No dread have they of discord and of strife;
Unknown the names of husband and of sire,
Unfelt the plagues of matrimonial life.

Oft have they bask'd beneath the sunny walls,
Oft have the benches bow'd beneath their
weight,

How jocund are their looks when dinner calls!
How smoke the cutlets on their crowded plate!

O! let not temperance, too disdainful, hear
How long their feasts, how long their dinners
last:

Nor let the fair, with a contemptuous sneer,
On these unmarried men reflections cast!

The splendid fortune and the beauteous face (Themselves confess it, and their sires bemoan)

Too soon are caught by scarlet and by lace;
These sons of science shine in black alone.

Forgive, ye fair, th' involuntary fault,
If these no feats of gaiety display,
Where through proud Ranelagh's wide-echoing vault

Melodious Frasi trills her quavering lay.

Say, is the sword well suited to the band?
Does broider'd coat agree with sable gown?
Can Mechlin laces shade a churchman's hand?
Or learning's votaries ape the beaux of town?

Perhaps in these time-tottering walls reside
Some who were once the darling of the fair,
Some who of old could tastes and fashions guide,
Control the manager, and awe the player.

But Science now has fill'd their vacant mind
With Rome's rich spoils and truth's exalted views,

Fir'd them with transports of a nobler kind,
And bade them slight all females—but the muse.

Full many a lark, high towering to the sky,
Unheard, unheeded, greets th' approach of
light;

Full many a star, unseen by mortal eye,
With twinkling lustre, glimmers through the night.

Some future Herring, who, with dauntless
breast,

Rebellion's torrent shall like him oppose;
Some mute, unconscious Hardwicke here may
rest,

Some Pelham, dreadful to his country's foes.

From prince and people to command applause,
'Midst ermin'd peers to guide the high debate,

To shield Britannia's and Religion's laws,
And steer with steady course the helm of
state—

Fate yet forbids; nor circumscribes alone
Their growing virtues, but their crimes confines;

Forbids in Freedom's veil t' insult the throne;
Beneath her mask to hide the worst designs;

To fill the madding crowd's perverted mind
With "pensions, taxes, marriages, and Jews;"

Or shut the gates of heaven on lost mankind,
And wrest their darling hopes, their future
views.

Far from the giddy town's tumultuous strife,
Their wishes yet have never learn'd to stray;
Content and happy in a single life,

They keep the noiseless tenor of their way.

E'en now their books from cobwebs to protect,

Enclos'd by doors of glass in Doric style,
On polish'd pillars rais'd with bronzes deck'd,
They claim the passing tribute of a smile.

Oft are the authors' names, tho' richly bound,
Mis-spelt by blundering binders' want of
And many a catalogue is strew'd around, [care,
To tell the admiring guest what books are
there.

For who, to thoughtless ignorance a prey,
Neglects to hold short dalliance with a book?
Who there but wishes to prolong his stay,
And on those cases casts a lingering look?

Reports attract the lawyer's parting eyes;
Novels Lord Fopling and Sir Plume require;
For songs and plays the voice of Beauty cries,
And Sense and Nature Grandison desire.

For thee, who, mindful of thy lov'd compeers,
Dost in these lines their artless tale relate,
If chance, with prying search, in future years,
Some antiquarian should inquire thy fate;

Haply some friend may shake his hoary head
 And say, "Each morn unchill'd by frosts
 he ran,
 With hose ungarter'd, o'er yon turfy bed,
 To reach the chapel ere the psalms began ;
 "There, in the arms of that lethargic chair,
 Which rears its old moth-eaten back so high,
 At noon he quaff'd three glasses to the fair,
 And por'd upon the news with curious eye.
 "Now by the fire engag'd in serious talk,
 Or mirthful converse, would he loitering
 stand,
 Then in the garden choose a sunny walk,
 Or launch'd the polish'd bowl with steady
 hand.
 "One morn we miss'd him at the hour of prayer,
 Nor in the hall, nor on his favorite green :
 Another came, nor yet within the chair,
 Nor yet at bowls or chapel was he seen.
 "The next we heard that in a neighbouring shire,
 That day to church he led a blushing bride,
 A nymph whose snowy vest and maiden fear
 Improv'd her beauty while the knot was tied.
 "Now, by his patron's bounteous care remov'd,
 He roves enraptur'd thro' the fields of Kent ;
 Yet, ever mindful of the place he lov'd,
 Read here the letter which he lately sent :"

The Letter.

IN rural innocence secure I dwell,
 Alike to fortune and to fame unknown :
 Approving conscience cheers my humble cell,
 And social quiet marks me for her own.
 Next to the blessings of religious truth,
 Two gifts my endless gratitude engage—
 A wife, the joy and transport of my youth ;
 Now with a son, the comfort of my age,
 Seek not to draw me from this kind retreat
 In loftier spheres unfit, untaught to move ;
 Content with calm domestic life, where meet
 The sweets of friendship, and the smiles of
 love.

§ 175. The Three Warnings. A Tale.
By Mrs. THRALE.

THE tree of deepest root is found
 Least willing still to quit the ground :
 'Twas therefore said by ancient sages,
 That love of life increas'd with years
 So much, that in our latter stages,
 When pains grow sharp, and sickness rages,
 The greatest love of life appears.
 This great affection to believe,
 Which all confess, but few perceive,
 If old assertions can't prevail,
 Be pleas'd to hear a modern tale.
 When sports went round, and all were gay,
 On neighbour Dobson's wedding-day,
 Death call'd aside the jocund groom
 With him into another room ;

And looking grave—"You must, says he,
 'Quit your sweet bride, and come with me.'
 'With you? and quit my Susan's side?
 With you?' the hapless husband cried :
 'Young as I am, 'tis monstrous hard!
 Besides, in truth, I'm not prepar'd :
 My thoughts on other matters go ;
 This is my wedding night, you know.'
 What more he urg'd I have not heard,
 His reason could not well be stronger ;
 So Death the poor delinquent spar'd,
 And left to live a little longer.
 Yet calling up a serious look,
 His hour-glass trembled while he spoke—
 'Neighbour,' he said, 'farewell: no more
 Shall Death disturb your mirthful hour ;
 And farther, to avoid all blame
 Of cruelty upon my name,
 To give you time for preparation,
 And fit you for your future station,
 Three several warnings you shall have,
 Before you're summon'd to the grave :
 Willing for once I'll quit my prey,
 And grant a kind reprieve ;
 In hopes you'll have no more to say,
 But when I call again this way,
 Well pleas'd the world will leave.'
 To these conditions both consented,
 And parted perfectly contented.
 What next the hero of our tale besel,
 How long he liv'd, how wise, how well,
 How roundly he pursu'd his course,
 And smok'd his pipe, and strok'd his horse,
 The willing muse shall tell :
 He chaffer'd then, he bought, he sold,
 Nor once perceiv'd his growing old,
 Nor thought of Death as near ;
 His friends not false, his wife no shrew,
 Many his gains, his children few,
 He pass'd his hours in peace :
 But while he view'd his wealth increase,
 While thus along life's dusty road
 The beaten track content he trod,
 Old Time, whose haste no mortal spares,
 Uncall'd, unheeded, unawares,
 Brought on his eightieth year.
 And now, one night, in musing mood,
 And all alone, he sate,
 Th' unwelcome messenger of Fate
 Once more before him stood.
 Half kill'd with anger and surprise,
 'So soon return'd!' old Dobson cries.
 'So soon, d'ye call it?' Death replies ;
 'Surely my friend, you're but in jest ;
 Since I was here before
 'Tis six-and-thirty years at least,
 And you are now fourscore.'
 'So much the worse,' the clown rejoind ;
 'To spare the aged would be kind :
 However, see your search be legal ;
 And your authority—is't regal ?
 Else you are come on a fool's errand,
 With but a secretary's warrant.
 Besides, you promis'd me three warnings,
 Which I have look'd for nights and mornings ;
 But for that loss of time and ease,
 I can recover damages.'

'I know,' cries Death, 'that at the best,
I seldom am a welcome guest;
But don't be captious, friend at least:
I little thought you'd still be able
To stump about your farm and stable;
Your years have run to a great length;
I wish you joy, though, of your strength!'

'Hold,' says the farmer, 'not so fast!
I have been lame these four years past.'

'And no great wonder,' Death replies;
'However, you still keep your eyes;
And sure to see one's loves and friends,
For legs and arms would make amends.'

'Perhaps,' says Dobson, 'so it might,
But latterly I've lost my sight.'

'This is a shocking story, faith;
Yet there's some comfort still,' says Death:
Each strives your sadness to amuse;
I warrant you hear all the news.'

'There's none,' cries he; 'and if there were,

I'm grown so deaf, I could not hear.'

'Nay, then!' the spectre stern rejoin'd,

'These are unjustifiable yearnings;
If you are lame, and deaf, and blind,
You have had your three sufficient warnings.
So come along, no more we'll part.'
He said, and touch'd him with his dart;
And now old Dobson turning pale,
Yields to his fate—so ends my tale.

§ 176. The Cit's Country Box. LLOYD.
Vos sapere, et solos aio bene vivere, quorum
Conspicitur nitidis fundata pecunia villis. HOR.

THE wealthy cit, grown old in trade,
Now wishes for the rural shade,
And buckles to his one-horse chair
Old Dobbin, or the foundered mare:
While wedg'd in closely by his side,
Sits Madam, his unwieldy bride,
With Jacky on a stool before 'em,
And out they jog in due decorum.
Scarce past the turnpike half a mile,
'How all the country seems to smile!
And as they slowly jog together,
The cit commends the road and weather:
While Madam doats upon the trees,
And longs for ev'ry house she sees;
Admires its views, its situation,
And thus she opens her oration:

'What signifies the loads of wealth,
Without that richest jewel, health?
Excuse the fondness of a wife,
Who doats upon your precious life!
Such ceaseless toil, such constant care,
Is more than human strength can bear:
One may observe it in your face—
Indeed, my dear, you break apace;
And nothing can your health repair,
But exercise and country air.

Sir Traffic has a house, you know,
About a mile from Cheney-row:
He's a good man, indeed, 'tis true;
But not so warm, my dear, as you:
And folks are always apt to sneer—
One would not be outdone, my dear!

Sir Traffic's name, so well applied,
Awak'd his brother-merchant's pride;
And Thrifty, who had all his life
Paid utmost deference to his wife,
Confess'd her arguments had reason;
And by th' approaching summer season
Draws a few hundreds from the stocks,
And purchases his country box.

Some three or four miles out of town
(An hour's ride will bring you down)
He fixes on his choice abode,
Not half a furlong from the road;
And so convenient does it lay,
The stages pass it every day;
And then so snug, so mighty pretty,
To have a house so near the city!
Take but your places at the Boar,
You're set down at the very door.

Well then, suppose them fix'd at last,
White washing, painting, scrubbing past,
Hugging themselves in ease and clover,
With all the fuss of moving over;
Lo, a new heap of whims are bred,
And wanton in my lady's head.

'Well! to be sure, it must be own'd,
It is a charming spot of ground:
So sweet a distance for a ride,
And all about so countrified;
'Twould come but to a trifling price,
To make it quite a paradise!

I cannot bear those nasty rails,
Those ugly, broken, mouldy pales:
Suppose, my dear, instead of these,
We build a railing all Chinese;
Although one hates to be expos'd,
'Tis dismal to be thus enclos'd;
One hardly any object sees—
I wish you'd fell these odious trees,
Objects continually passing by,
Were something to amuse the eye;
But to be pent within the walls,
One might as well be at St. Paul's.
Our house beholders would adore,
Was there a level lawn before,
Nothing its views to incommode,
But quite laid open to the road;
While every traveller in amaze,
Should on our little mansion gaze;
And, pointing to the choice retreat,
Cry, "That's Sir Thrifty's country-seat!"

No doubt her arguments prevail,
For Madam's TASTE can never fail.

Blest age! when all men may procure
The title of a connoisseur;
When noble and ignoble herd
Are govern'd by a single word;
Though, like the royal German dames,
It bears an hundred Christian names,
As Genius, Fancy, Judgement, Gout,
Whim, Caprice, Je ne sais quoi, Virtù;
Which appellations all describe
TASTE, and the modern tasteful tribe.

Now bricklayers, carpenters, and joiners,
With Chinese artists and designers,
Produce their schemes of alteration,
To work this wondrous reformation.

The useful dome, which secret stood,
 Embosom'd in the yew tree's wood,
 The traveller with amazement sees
 A temple Gothic or Chinese,
 With many a bell and tawdry rag on,
 And crested with a sprawling dragon;
 A wooden arch is bent astride
 A ditch of water, four feet wide,
 With angles, curves, and zig-zag lines,
 From Halfpenny's exact designs;
 In front a level lawn is seen,
 Without a shrub upon the green;
 Where taste would want its first great law,
 But for the skulking sly ha-ha;
 By whose miraculous assistance
 You gain a prospect two fields' distance.
 And now from Hyde-park Corner come
 The gods of Athens and of Rome.
 Here squabby Cupids take their places,
 With Venus, and the clumsy Graces;
 Apollo there, with aim so clever,
 Stretches his leaden bow for ever,
 And there, without the power to fly,
 Stands fix'd a tip-toe Mercury.

The villa thus completely grac'd,
 All own that Thrifty has a taste;
 And Madam's female friends and cousins,
 With common-council men by dozens,
 Flock every Sunday to the seat,
 To stare about them and to eat.

§ 177. Report of an adjudged Case, not to be found in any of the Books. COWPER.

BETWEEN Nose and Eyes a strange contest arose;

The spectacles set them unhappily wrong;
 The point in dispute was, as all the world knows, [long.

To which the said spectacles ought to be—
 So the Tongue was the lawyer, and argu'd the cause

With a great deal of skill, and a wig full of learning; [laws,
 While chief baron Ear sat to balance the
 So fam'd for his talent in nicely discerning.

In behalf of the Nose, it will quickly appear,
 And your lordship, he said, will undoubtedly
 find,

That the Nose has had spectacles always in wear,

Which amounts to possession time out of
 mind.

Then holding the spectacles up to the court—
 Your lordship observes they are made with a straddle,

As wide as the ridge of the Nose is; in short,
 Design'd to sit close to it, just like a saddle.

Again, would your lordship a moment suppose

('Tis a case that has happen'd and may be again)

That the visage or countenance had not a
 Nose,

Pray who would or who could wear spectacles then?

On the whole it appears, and my argument shows,

With a reasoning the court will never condemn,

That the spectacles plainly were made for the Nose,

And the Nose was as plainly intended for them.

Then shifting his side, as the lawyer knows how,
 He pleaded again in behalf of the Eyes;

But what were the arguments few people know,
 For the world did not think they were equally wise.

So his lordship decreed, with a grave solemn tone,

Decisive and clear, without one if or but—

That whenever the Nose put his spectacles on,
 By day-light or candle-light—Eyes should be shut.

§ 178. *On the Birth-Day of Shakspeare. A
 Ounto. Taken from his Works.* BERENGER.

Natura lapsa valere, et mentis viribus excitari,
 et quasi quodam divino spiritu afflari.

—PEACE to this meeting!

Joy and fair time, health and good wishes:

Now, worthy friends, the cause why we are met,

Is in celebration of the day that gave

Immortal Shakspeare to this favor'd isle,

The most replenished sweet work of nature,

Which from the prime creation e'er she fram'd.

O thou divinest Nature! how thyself thou blazon'st

In this thy son! form'd in thy prodigality,

To hold thy mirror up, and give the time

Its very form and pressure! When he speaks

Each aged ear plays truant at his tales,

And younger hearings are quite ravished,

So voluble is his discourse—gentle

As Zephyr blowing beneath the violet,

Not wagging its sweet head—yet as rough

(His noble blood enchain'd) as the rude wind,

That by the top doth take the mountain pine

And make him stoop to th' vale—'Tis wonderful

That an invisible instinct should frame him

To loyalty, unlearn'd; honor, untaught;

Civility, not seen in others; knowledge

That wildly grows in him, but yields a crop

As if it had been sown. What a piece of work!

How noble in faculty! infinite in reason!

A combination and a form indeed,

Where every god did seem to set his seal!

Heaven has him now—yet let our idolatrous

Still sanctify his relics; and this day [fancy

Stand aye distinguish'd in the kalendar

To the last syllable of recorded time:

For, if we take him but for all in all,

We ne'er shall look upon his like again.

§ 179. On the Invention of Letters.

TELL me what Genius did the art invent,

The lively image of the voice to paint;

Who first the secret how to colour sound,

And to give shape to reason, wisely found;

With bodies how to clothe ideas, taught;
 And how to draw the picture of a thought:
 Who taught the hand to speak, the eye to hear
 A silent language roving far and near;
 Whose softest noise outstrips loud thunder's
     sound,
 And spreads her accents through the world's vast round;
 A voice heard by the deaf, spoke by the dumb,
 Whose echo reaches long, long time to come:
 Which dead men speak, as well as those alive—
 Tell me what Genius did this art contrive.

§ 180. The Answer.

THE noble art to Cadmus owes its rise
 Of painting words, and speaking to the eyes;
 He first in wondrous magic fetters bound
 The airy voice, and stopp'd the flying sound;
 The various figures, by his pencil wrought,
 Gave color, form, and body to the thought.

§ 181. On a Spider.

ARTIST, who underneath my table
 Thy curious texture hast display'd!
 Who, if we may believe the fable,
     Wert once a lovely blooming maid!
 Insidious, restless, watchful spider,
     Fear no officious damsel's broom;
 Extend thy artful fabric wider,
     And spread thy banners round my room.
 Swept from the rich man's costly ceiling,
     Thou'rt welcome to my homely roof;
 Here mayst thou find a peaceful dwelling,
     And undisturb'd attend thy woof:
 Whilst I thy wondrous fabric stare at,
     And think on hapless poet's fate;
 Like thee confin'd to lonely garret,
     And rudely banish'd rooms of state.
 And as from out thy tortur'd body
     Thou draw'st thy slender string with pain;
 So does he labor, like a noddy,
     To spin materials from his brain:
 He for some fluttering tawdry creature,
     That spreads her charms before his eye;
 And that's a conquest little better
     Than thine o'er captive butterfly.
 Thus far 'tis plain we both agree,
     Perhaps our deaths may better show it—
 'Tis ten to one but penury
     Ends both the spider and the poet.

§ 182. The Extent of Cookery. SHENSTONE.

———Aliusque et idem.

WHEN Tom to Cambridge first was sent,
 A plain brown bob he wore,
 Read much, and look'd as though he meant
     To be a fop no more.
 See him to Lincoln's Inn repair,
     His resolution flag;
 He cherishes a length of hair,
     And tucks it in a bag.

Nor Coke nor Salkeld he regards,
     But gets into the house;
 And soon a judge's rank rewards
     His pliant votes and bows.
 Adieu ye hobs! ye bags, give place!
     Full-bottoms come instead!
 Good lord! to see the various ways
     Of dressing—a calf's-head.

§ 183. Slender's Ghost. SHENSTONE.

Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

BENEATH a church-yard yew,
 Decay'd and worn with age,
 At dusk of eve, methought I spied
 Poor Slender's ghost, that whimpering cried,
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!
 Ye gentle bards, give ear!
     Who talk of amorous rage,
 Who spoil the lily, rob the rose;
 Come learn of me to weep your woes!
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!
 Why should such labor'd strains
     Your formal Muse engage?
 I never dreamt of flame or dart,
 That fir'd my breast, or pierc'd my heart,
     But sigh'd, O sweet Anne Page!
 And you, whose love-sick minds
     No medicine can assuage,
 Accuse the leech's art no more,
 But learn of Slender to deplore,
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!
 And you, whose souls are held
     Like linnets in a cage,
 Who talk of fetters, links, and chains,
 Attend, and imitate my strains:
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!
 And you, who boast or grieve,
     What horrid wars ye wage,
 Of wounds receiv'd from many an eye;
 Yet mean as I do when I sigh,
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!
 Hence every fond conceit
     Of shepherd, or of sage!
 'Tis Slender's voice, 'tis Slender's way,
 Expresses all you have to say—
     O sweet! O sweet Anne Page!

§ 184. Hamlet's Soliloquy imitated. JAGO.

To print, or not to print—that is the question:
 Whether 'tis better in a trunk to bury
 The quirks and crotchets of outrageous fancy,
 Or send a well-wrote copy to the press,
 And, by disclosing, end them. To print, to doubt
 No more; and by one act to say we end
 The head-ache, and a thousand natural shocks
 Of scribbling phrensy—'tis a consummation
 Devoutly to be wish'd. To print—to beam
 From the same shelf with Pope, in calf well
     bound:
 To sleep, perchance, with Quarles—Ay, there's the rub—

For to what class a writer may be doom'd,
When he hath shuffled off some paltry stuff,
Must give us pause. There's the respect that makes
Th' unwilling poet keep his piece nine years.
For who would bear the impatient thirst of fame,
The pride of conscious merit, and, 'bove all,
The tedious importunity of friends,
When he himself might his quietus make
With a bare inkhorn? Who would fardels
bear,
To groan and sweat under a load of wit,
But that the tread of sweet Parnassus' hill
(That undiscover'd country, with whose bays Few travellers return) puzzles the will,
And makes us rather bear to live unknown,
Than run the hazard to be known and damn'd.
Thus critics do make cowards of us all;
And thus the healthful face of many a poem
Is sicklied o'er with a pale manuscript;
And enterprises of great fire and spirit
With this regard from Dodsley turn away,
And lose the name of Authors.

§ 185. To the Memory of George Lewis Langton, Esq. who died on his Travels to Rome.

SHIPLEY.

LANGTON, dear partner of my soul,
Accept what pious passion meditates
To grace thy fate. Sad memory,
And grateful love and impotent regret,
Shall wake to paint thy gentle mind,
The wise good-nature, friendship delicate;
In secret converse, native mirth
And sprightly fancy, sweet artificer
Of social pleasure; nor forgot
The noble thirst of knowledge and fair fame
That led thee far through foreign climes
Inquisitive, but chief the pleasant banks
Of Tiber, ever-honor'd stream,
Detain'd thee visiting the last remains
Of ancient art; fair forms exact
In sculpture, columns, and the mould'ring bulk
Of theatres. In deep thought wrapp'd
Of old renown, thy mind survey'd the scenes
Delighted where the first of men
Once dwelt, familiar; Scipio, virtuous chief,
Stern Cato, and the patriot mind
Of faithful Brutus, best philosopher.
Well did the gen'rous search employ
Thy blooming years by virtue crown'd, though death
Unseen oppress'd thee, far from home,
A helpless stranger. No familiar voice,
No pitying eye cheer'd thy last pangs.
O worthy longest days! for thee shall flow
The pious solitary tear,
And thoughtful friendship sadden o'er thine urn.

§ 186. The Brewer's Coachman. TAYLOR.
HONEST William, an easy and good-natur'd
fellow,

Would a little too oft get a little too mellow.
Body coachman was he to an eminent brewer—
No better e'er sat on a box to be sure.

His coach was kept clean, and no mothers or nurses [his horses.
Took that care of their babes that he took of
He had these—aye, and fifty good qualities more, [o'er.
But the business of tippling could ne'er be got
So his master effectually mended the matter,
By hiring a man who drank nothing but water.
Now, William, says he, you see the plain case;
Had you drank as he does, you had kept a good place. [done so,
Drink water! quoth William—had all men
You'd never have wanted a coachman, I trow.
They're soakers, like me, whom you load with reproaches, [coaches.
That enable you brewers to ride in your § 187. Ode on the Death of Matzel, a favorite Bullfinch. Addressed to Philip Stanhope, Esq. (natural Son of the Earl of Chesterfield) to whom the Author had given the Reversion of it when he left Dresden. WILLIAMS.

TRY not, my Stanhope, 'tis in vain,
To stop your tears, or hide your pain,
Or check your honest rage:
Give sorrow and revenge their scope,
My present joy, your future hope,
Lies murder'd in his cage.

Matzel's no more! Ye graces, loves,
Ye linnets, nightingales, and doves,
Attend th' untimely bier;
Let every sorrow be express'd,
Beat with your wings each mournful breast,
And drop the nat'ral tear.

In height of song, in beauty's pride,
By fell Grimalkin's claws he died—
But vengeance shall have way;
On pains and tortures I'll refine;
Yet, Matzel, that one death of thine
His nine will ill repay.

For thee, my bird, the sacred Nine,
Who lov'd thy tuneful notes, shall join
In thy funereal verse:
My painful task shall be to write
Th' eternal dirge which they indite,
And hang it on thy hearse.

In vain I lov'd, in vain I mourn
My bird, who never to return
Is fled to happier shades,
Where Lesbia shall for him prepare
The place most charming and most fair,
Of all th' Elysian glades.

There shall thy notes in cypress grove
Soothe wretched ghosts that died for love;
There shall thy plaintive strain
Lull impious Phædra's endless grief,
To Procris yield some short relief,
And soften Dido's pain:

Till Proserpine by chance shall hear
Thy notes, and make thee all her care,
And love thee with my love;
While each attendant soul shall praise
The matchless Matzel's tuneful lays,
And all his songs approve.

§ 188. To-morrow. COTTON.

Pereunt et imputantur.

TO-MORROW, didst thou say?
 Methought I heard Horatio say, 'To-morrow.
 Go to—I will not hear of it—To-morrow!
 'Tis a sharper, who stakes his penury
 Against thy plenty—who takes thy ready cash,
 And pays thee nought but wishes, hopes, and promises,
 The currency of idiots—injurious bankrupt,
 That gulls the easy creditor!—To-morrow!
 It is a period no where to be found
 In all the hoary registers of Time,
 Unless perchance in the fool's calendar.
 Wisdom disclaims the word, nor holds society
 With those who own it. No, my Horatio,
 'Tis Fancy's child, and Folly is its father;
 Wrought of such stuff as dreams are, and as baseless
 As the fantastic visions of the evening.

But soft, my friend—arrest the present moment;
 For be assur'd they all are arrant tell-tales;
 And though their flight be silent, and their path
 Trackless, as the wing'd couriers of the air,
 They post to heaven, and there record thy folly,
 Because, though station'd on th' important watch,

Thou, like a sleeping, faithless sentinel,
 Didst let them pass unnotic'd, unimprov'd.
 And know, for that thou slumb'rest on the guard,

Thou shalt be made to answer at the bar
 For every fugitive; and when thou thus Shalt stand impleaded at the high tribunal
 Of hood-wink'd Justice, who shall tell thy audit?

Then stay the present instant, dear Horatio,
 Imprint the marks of wisdom on its wings.
 'Tis of more worth than kingdoms! far more precious

Than all the crimson treasures of life's fountain.
 O! let it not elude thy grasp; but, like
 The good old patriarch upon record,
 Hold the fleet angel fast until he bless thee.

§ 189. On Lord Cobham's Gardens. COTTON.

IT puzzles much the sages' brains,
 Where Eden stood of yore:
 Some place it in Arabia's plains;
 Some say, it is no more.
 But Cobham can these tales confute,
 As all the curious know;
 For he has prov'd beyond dispute
     That Paradise is Stowe.

§ 190. To a Child five Years old. COTTON.

FAIREST flow'r, all flow'rs excelling
 Which in Eden's garden grew,
 Flow'rs of Eve's embowered dwelling
 Are, my fair one, types of you.
 Mark, my Polly, how the roses
 Emulate thy damask cheek;

How the bud its sweets discloses;
 Buds thy opening bloom bespeak.
 Lilies are, by plain direction,
 Emblems of a double kind;
 Emblems of thy fair complexion,
 Emblems of thy fairer mind.
 But, dear girl, both flow'rs and beauty,
 Blossom, fade, and die away:
 Then pursue good sense and duty,
 Evergreens that ne'er decay.

§ 191. To Miss Lucy Fortescue. LYTTLTON.

ONCE by the Muse alone inspir'd,
 I sung my am'rous strains:
 No serious love my bosom fir'd;
 Yet every tender maid, deceiv'd,
 The idly mournful tale believ'd,
 And wept my fancied pains.

But Venus now, to punish me,
 For having feign'd so well,
 Has made my heart so fond of thee,
 That not the whole Aonian quire
 Can accents soft enough inspire
     Its real name to tell.

§ 192. *To Mr. West*, at Wickham†.* 1740.
LYTTLTON.

FAIR Nature's sweet simplicity,
 With elegance refin'd,
 Well in thy seat, my friend, I see,
 But better in thy mind.

To both from courts and all their state
 Eager I fly, to prove
 Joys far above a courtier's fate,
 Tranquillity and love.

§ 193. The Temple of the Muses. To the Countess Temple.

THE Muses and Graces to Phœbus com-
     plain'd,
 That no more on the earth a Sappho remain'd:
 That their empire of wit was now at an end,
 And on beauty alone the sex must depend:
 To the men he had given all his fancy and fire,
 Art of healing to Armstrong‡, as well as his
     lyre:
 When Apollo replied, "To make you amends,
 In one Fair you shall see wit and virtue, good friends;
 The Grecian high-spirit and sweetness I'll join
 With a true Roman virtue, to make it divine:
 Your pride and my boast, thus form'd, would you know,
 You must visit the earthly Elysium of Stowe."

§ 194. To a Lady who sung in too low a Voice.

WHEN beauteous Laura's gentle voice
 Divides the yielding air,
 Fix'd on her lips, the falt'ring sounds
 Excess of joy declare.

There, lingering round the rosy gate,
 They view their fragrant cell;
 Unwilling to depart that mouth
 Where all the Graces dwell.
 Some tuneful accents strike the sense
 With soft imperfect sound;
 While thousand others die within,
 In their own honey drown'd.
 Yet through this cloud, distinct and clear,
 Sweet sense directs its dart;
 And, while it seems to shun the ear,
 Strikes full upon the heart.

§ 195. To Miss Wilkes, on her Birth-day,
Aug. 16th, 1767. Written in France.
 WILKES.

AGAIN I tune the vocal lay
 On dear Maria's natal day.
 This happy day I'll not deplore
 My exile from my native shore.
 No tear of mine to-day shall flow
 For injur'd England's cruel woe,
 For impious wounds to Freedom given,
 The first, most sacred gift of Heaven.
 The Muse with joy shall prune her wing;
 Maria's ripen'd graces sing:
 And, at seventeen, with truth shall own
 The bud of beauty's fairly blown.
 Softness and sweetest innocence
 Here shed their gentle influence;
 Fair modesty comes in their train,
 To grace her sister virtue's reign.
 Then, to give spirit, taste, and ease,
 The sov'reign art, the art to please;
 Good-humour'd wit, and fancy gay,
 To-morrow cheerful as to-day,
 The sun-shine of a mind serene,
 Where all is peace within, are seen.
 What can the grateful Muse ask more?
 The gods have lavish'd all their store.
 Maria shines their darling care;
 Still, keep her, Heaven, from every snare:
 May still unspotted be her fame,
 May she remain through life the same,
 Unchang'd in all—except in name!

§ 196. To Miss Wilkes on her Birth-day,
Aug. 16th. 1768. Written in Prison.
 WILKES.

How shall the Muse in prison sing,
 How prune her drooping ruffled wing?
 Maria is the potent spell,
 E'en in these walls, all grief to quell;
 To cheer the heart, rapture inspire,
 And wake to notes of joy the lyre,
 The tribute verse again to pay
 On this auspicious festive day.
 When doom'd to quit the patriot band,
 And exil'd from my native land,
 Maria was my sure relief;
 Her presence banish'd every grief.

Pleasure came smiling in her train,
 And chas'd the family of Pain.
 Let lovers every charm admire,
 The easy shape, the heav'nly fire
 That from those modest beaming eyes
 The captive heart at once surprise.
 A father's is another part;
 I praise the virtues of the heart,
 And wit so elegant and free,
 Attemper'd sweet with modesty.
 And may kind Heaven a lover send
 Of sense, of honor, and a friend,
 Those virtues always to protect,
 Those beauties—never to neglect!

§ 197. An Ode in imitation of Alcæus.
 SIR WILLIAM JONES.

WHAT constitutes a state?
 Not high-rais'd battlements or labor'd mound,
 Thick wall or moated gate;
 Not cities proud, with spires and turrets crown'd;
 Not bays and broad-arm'd ports,
 Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
 Not starr'd and spangled courts,
 Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride.
 No—MEN, high-minded MEN,
 With powers as far above dull brutes endu'd
 In forest, brake, or den,
 As beasts excel cold rocks and brambles rude:
 Men who their duties know,
 But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain;
 Prevent the long-aim'd blow,
 And crush the tyrant while they rend the chain:
 These constitute a state;
 And Sovereign Law, that State's collected will,
 O'er thrones and globes elate
 Sits empress, crowning good, repressing ill:
 Smit by her sacred frown,
 The fiend Discretion * like a vapour sinks,
 And e'en the all-dazzling crown
 Hides his faint rays, and at her bidding shrinks.
 Such was this heaven-lov'd isle,
 Than Lesbos fairer and the Cretan shore!
 No more shall freedom smile?
 Shall Britons languish, and be men no more?
 Since all must life resign,
 Those sweet rewards which decorate the brave
 'Tis folly to decline,
 And steal inglorious to the silent grave.

§ 198. The Choice of a Wife by Cheese.
 CAPTAIN THOMPSON.

THERE liv'd in York, an age ago,
 A man whose name was Pimlico:
 He lov'd three sisters passing well,
 But which the best he could not tell.
 These sisters three, divinely fair,
 Show'd Pimlico their tenderest care:
 For each was elegantly bred,
 And all were much inclin'd to wed;

* Discretionary or arbitrary power.

And all made Pimlico their choice,
 And prais'd him with their sweetest voice.
 Young Pim, the gallant and the gay,
 Like ass divided 'tween the hay,
 At last resolv'd to gain his ease,
 And choose his wife by eating cheese.
 He wrote his card, he seal'd it up,
 And said with them that night he'd sup;
 Desir'd that there might only be
 Good Cheshire cheese, and but them three;
 He was resolv'd to crown his life,
 And by that means to fix his wife.
 The girls were pleas'd at his conceit;
 Each dress'd herself divinely neat;
 With faces full of peace and plenty,
 Blooming with roses under twenty.
 For surely Nancy, Betsy, Sally,
 Were sweet as lilies of the valley:
 But singly surely Buxom Bet
 Was like new hay and mignonet;
 But each surpass'd a poet's fancy,
 For that, of truth, was said of Nancy:
 And as for Sal, she was a Donna,
 As fair as those of old Cretona,*
 Who to Apelles lent their faces
 To make up madam Helen's graces.
 To those the gay divided Pim
 Came elegantly smart and trim:
 When ev'ry smiling maiden, certain,
 Cut of the cheese to try her fortune.
 Nancy, at once, not fearing—caring
 To show her saving ate the paring;
 And Bet, to show her gen'rous mind,
 Cut, and then threw away the rind;
 While prudent Sarah, sure to please,
 Like a clean maiden, scrap'd the cheese.
 This done, young Pimlico replied,
 "Sally I now declare my bride:
 With Nan I can't my welfare put,
 For she has prov'd a dirty slut:
 And Betsy, who has par'd the rind,
 Would give my fortune to the wind.
 Sally the happy medium chose,
 And I with Sally will repose;
 She's prudent, cleanly; and the man
 Who fixes on a nuptial plan
 Can never err, if he will choose
 A wife by cheese—before he ties the noose."

§ 199. The Choice. POMFRET.

IF Heaven the grateful liberty would give,
 That I might choose my method how to live,
 And all those hours propitious fate should lend,
 In blissful ease and satisfaction spend:

Near some fair town I'd have a private seat,
 Built uniform, not little, nor too great:
 Better, if on a rising ground it stood;
 On this side fields, on that a neighbouring wood.
 It should within no other things contain,
 But what are useful, necessary, plain:
 Methinks 'tis nauseous, and I'll ne'er endure
 The needless pomp of gaudy furniture.
 A little garden, grateful to the eye,
 Where a cool rivulet runs murmuring by;

On whose delicious banks a stately row
 Of shady limes, or sycamores, should grow.
 At th' end of which a silent study plac'd
 Should be with all the noblest authors grac'd:
 Horace and Virgil, in whose mighty lines
 Immortal wit, and solid learning shines;
 Sharp Juvenal, and amorous Ovid too,
 Who all the turns of love's soft passion knew.
 He that with judgement reads his charming lines,

In which strong art with stronger nature joins,
 Must grant his fancy does the best excel,
 His thoughts so tender, and express'd so well:
 With all those moderns, men of steady sense,
 Esteem'd for learning and for eloquence.
 In some of these, as fancy should advise,
 I'd always take my morning exercise:
 For sure no minutes bring us more content,
 Than those in pleasing useful studies spent.

I'd have a clear and competent estate,
 That I might live genteelly, but not great:
 As much as I could moderately spend,
 A little more sometimes t'oblige a friend.
 Nor should the sons of poverty repine
 Too much at fortune, they should taste of mine.
 And all that objects of true pity were,
 Should be reliev'd with what my wants could spare:

For that our Maker has too largely given,
 Should be return'd in gratitude to Heaven.
 A frugal plenty should my table spread;
 My friends with no luxurious dishes fed:
 Enough to satisfy, and something more
 To feed the stranger and the neighbouring poor.

Strong meat indulges vice, and pampering food
 Creates diseases, and inflames the blood.
 But what's sufficient to make nature strong,
 And the bright lamp of life continue long,
 I'd freely take; and, as I did possess,
 The bounteous Author of my plenty bless.
 I'd have a little vault, but always stor'd
 With the best wine each vintage could afford.
 Wine whets the wit, improves its native force,
 And gives a pleasant flavour to discourse:
 By making all our spirits debonair,
 Throws off the lees, the sediment of care.
 But as the greatest blessing Heaven lends
 May be debauch'd, and serve ignoble ends;
 So, but too oft, the grape's refreshing juice
 Does many mischievous effects produce:
 My house should no such rude disorders know,
 As from high drinking consequently flow;
 Nor would I use what was so kindly given,
 To the dishonour of indulgent Heaven.
 If any neighbour came, he should be free,
 Us'd with respect, and not uneasy be,
 In my retreat, or to himself or me.
 What freedom, prudence, and right reason give,
 All men may, with impunity, receive:
 But the least swerving from their rule's too
 much;

For what's forbidden us, 'tis death to touch.
 That life may be more comfortable yet,
 And all my joys refin'd, sincere, and great;

* Apelles, from five beautiful virgins of Cretona, drew the beautiful Helen.

I'd choose two friends, whose company would be

A great advance to my felicity:

Well-born, of humors suited to my own,
Discreet, and men as well as books have
known:

Brave, generous, witty, and exactly free
From loose behaviour, or formality:

Airy and prudent; merry, but not light;
Quick in discerning, and in judging right:

Secret they should be, faithful to their trust;
In reasoning cool, strong, temperate, and just:

Obliging, open, without huffing, brave,
Brisk in gay talking, and in sober, grave:

Close in dispute, but not tenacious; try'd
By solid reason, and let that decide:

Not prone to lust, revenge, or envious hate;

Nor busy meddlers with intrigues of state:

Strangers to slander, and sworn foes to spite;

Not quarrelsome, but stout enough to fight:

Loyal, and pious; friends to Cæsar, true

As dying martyrs to their Maker too.

In their society I could not miss

A permanent, sincere, substantial bliss.

I'd be concern'd in no litigious jar;

Belov'd by all, not vainly popular.

Whate'er assistance I had power to bring,

T'oblige my country, or to serve my king,

Whene'er they call, I'd readily afford

My tongue, my pen, my counsel, or my sword.

Law-suits I'd shun with as much studious care

As I would dens where hungry lions are;

And rather put up injuries, than be

A plague to him, who'd be a plague to me.

I value quiet at a price too great,

To give for my revenge so dear a rate:

For what do we by all our bustle gain,

But counterfeit delight for real pain!

If Heaven a date of many years would give,

Thus I'd in pleasure, ease, and plenty live.

And as I near approach'd the verge of life,

Some kind relation (for I'd have no wife)

Should take upon him all my worldly care,

Whilst I did for a better state prepare.

Then I'd not be with any trouble vex'd,

Nor have the evening of my days perplex'd;

But, by a silent and a peaceful death,

Without a sigh resign my aged breath,

And when committed to the dust, I'd have

Few tears, but friendly, dropt into my grave;

Then would my exit so propitious be,

All men would wish to live and die like me.

§ 200. To my Candle. PETER PINDAR.

THOU lone companion of the spectred night,
I wake amid thy friendly watchful light,

To steal a precious hour from lifeless sleep—

Hark, the wild uproar of the winds! and hark,

Hell's genius roams the regions of the dark,

And swells the thund'ring horrors of the deep.

From cloud to cloud the pale moon hurrying flies;

Now blacken'd, and now flashing through her
skies,

But all is silence here—beneath thy beam.

I own I labor for the voice of praise—

For who would sink in dull oblivion's stream?

Who would not live in songs of distant days?

Thus while I wond'ring pause o'er Shakspeare's
page,

I mark, in visions of delight, the Sage,

High o'er the wrecks of man, who stands
sublime;

A column in the melancholy waste

(Its cities humbled, and its glories past),

Majestic 'mid the solitude of time.

Yet now to sadness let me yield the hour—

Yes, let the tears of purest friendship show'r.

I view, alas! what ne'er should die—

A form that wakes my deepest sigh;

A form that feels of death the leaden sleep—

Descending to the realms of shade,

I view a pale-ey'd, panting maid,

I see the Virtues o'er their fav'rite weep.

Ah! could the Muse's simple pray'r

Command the envied trump of fame,

Oblivion should Eliza spare:

A world should echo with her name.

Art thou departing too, my trembling friend?

Ah! draws thy little lustre to its end?

Yes, on thy frame Fate too shall fix her seal—

O let me, pensive, watch thy pale decay;

How fast that frame, so tender, wears away!

How fast thy life the restless minutes steal!

How slender now, alas! thy thread of fire!

Ah! falling, falling, ready to expire!

In vain thy struggles—all will soon be o'er.

At life thou snatchest with an eager leap:

Now round I see thy flame so feeble creep,

Faint, less'ning, quiv'ring, glimm'ring—now
no more!

Thus shall the sons of science sink away,

And thus of beauty fade the fairest flow'r—

For where's the giant who to Time shall say,

“Destructive tyrant, I arrest thy pow'r?”

§ 201. Presented together with a Knife by the Rev. SAMUEL BISHOP, Head Master of Merchant Taylors' School, to his Wife on her Wedding Day, which happened to be her Birth Day and New Year's Day.

A KNIFE, dear girl, cuts love, they say—

Mere modish love perhaps it may;

For any tool of any kind

Can separate what was never join'd.

The knife that cuts our love in two

Will have much tougher work to do:

Must cut your softness, worth, and spirit

Down to the vulgar size of merit;

To level yours with modern taste,

Must cut a world of sense to waste;

And from your single beauty's store,

Clip what would dizen out a score.

The self-same blade from me must sever
Sensation, judgement, sight for ever!
All mem'ry of endearments past,
All hope of comforts long to last,
All that makes fourteen years with you
A summer—and a short one too:
All that affection feels and fears,
When hours, without you, seem like years.—
Till that be done (and I'd as soon
Believe this knife will clip the moon)
Accept my present undeterr'd,
And leave their proverbs to the herd.
If in a kiss—delicious treat!
Your lips acknowledge the receipt;
Love, fond of such substantial fare,
And proud to play the glutton there,
All thoughts of cutting will disdain,
Save only—"cut and come again."

§ 202. By the same, with a Ring.

"THEE, Mary, with this ring I wed,"
So sixteen years ago I said—
Behold another ring! "For what?"
To wed thee o'er again—why not?

With the first ring I married youth,
Grace, beauty, innocence, and truth:
Taste long admir'd, sense long rever'd:
And all my Molly then appear'd.

If she, by merit since disclos'd,
Prov'd twice the woman I suppos'd,
I plead that double merit now,
To justify a double vow.

Here then to-day (with faith as sure,
With ardour as intense and pure,
As when amidst the rites divine
I took thy troth, and plighted mine)
To thee, sweet girl, my second ring,
A token and a pledge I bring;
With this I wed, till death us part,
Thy riper virtues to my heart;
These virtues, which, before untry'd,
The wife has added to the bride;
Those virtues, whose progressive claim,
Endearing wedlock's very name,
My soul enjoys, my song approves,
For conscience' sake, as well as love's.

For why?—They show me hour by hour
Honor's high thought, affection's pow'r,
Discretion's deed, sound judgement's sentence;
And teach me all things—but repentance.

§ 203. The Family Fireside. BISHOP.

"HOME's home, however homely," wisdom says,
And certain is the fact, though coarse the phrase:

To prove it, if it need a proof at all,
Mark what a train attends the Muse's call;
And as she leads the ideal group along,
Let your own feelings realize the song.

Clear then the stage! no scen'ry we require,
Save the snug circle round the parlour fire;
And enter marshall'd in procession fair
Each happier influence that predominates
there.

First love, by friendship mellow'd into bliss,
Lights the glad glow, and sanctifies the kiss;
When fondly welcom'd to the accustom'd seat
In sweet complaisance wife and husband
meet,

Look mutual pleasure, mutual purpose share,
Repose from labors, but unite in care.
Ambition!—does ambition there reside?
Yes!—when the boy in manly mood astride,
Of headstrong prowess innocently vain,
Canters, the jockey of his father's cane.
While emulation in the daughter's heart
Bears a more mild, tho' not less powerful part;
With zeal to shine her fluttering bosom
warms,

And in the romp the future housewife forms.
Or both perchance to graver sport incline,
And art and genius in their pastime join,
This the cramp riddle's puzzling knot invents,
That rears aloft the card-built tenements.
Think how joy animates intense though meek
The fading roses on the grandame cheek,
When proud the frolic progeny to survey,
She feels and owns an interest in their play,
Adopts each wish their wayward whims un-
fold,
And tells at every call, the story ten times
told.

Good-humoured dignity endears meanwhile
The narrative grandsire's venerable style.
If haply feats achiev'd in prime of youth,
Or pristine anecdote, or historic truth,
Or maxim shrewd, or admonition bland,
Affectionate attention's ear command.

To such society, so form'd, so blest,
Time, Thought, Remembrance, all impart
a zest,
And Expectation, day by day, more bright,
Round every prospect throws increasing light.
The simplest comforts act with strongest force;
Whate'er can give them, can improve, of course.

All this is common-place, you'll tell me:—
True!

What pity 'tis not common fashion too.
Roam as we will, plain sense at last will find
'Tis only seeking—what we left behind.
If individual good engage our hope,
Domestic virtues give the largest scope;
If plans of public eminence we trace,
Domestic virtues are its surest base.
Would great example make these truths more clear,

The greatest of examples shall appear.

Is there a man whom general suffrage owns
An honour to the majesty of thrones?
Is there a man whom general love's acclaim
Greets with each noblest and each dearest name?

He, 'midst the glare of state, and pomp of power,
Courts the soft sympathies of the family hour;
Not less illustrious at his own fireside,
By private merit's sterling standard tried, [spring,
Than when the cares from royal worth that
Call forth the people's father, and the king.

§ 204. Flowers.

BISHOP.

UNEQUAL to my theme with desperate feet
 I sought the Muse's bow'r;
 Anxious to see though all asham'd to meet
 Some bland inspiring power;
 When fleet along the rising gale
 The queen fair Fancy past;
 And through her rainbow-tinged veil
 A glance benignant cast!
 Then beck'ning to a secret glade,
 "Come see," she cry'd, "the train,
 Who own beneath this mystic shade,
 My visionary reign!"
 Proud to obey the glad command,
 I took with awe my stand:—
 Meanwhile, in many a varying vest
 Of rich expression aptly dress'd,
 Ideal myriads seem'd to rove
 Promiscuous through the cultur'd grove:
 And each, as inbred impulse led,
 From every flow'r-embroider'd bed
 Some certain plant, whose blossoms rose
 Significantly pleasing, chose.
 With frank, firm look, and light though steady tread
 Came Courage first, and cropt a dew-charg'd
 Rose;
 For in the tender rose might best be read
 His very essence—bloom that gently glows
 Impell'd by gentle breath—prone to dispense
 To all, sweetness, yet alert to show,
 If rash invasion ruder deeds commence,
 That warm resentment points a thorn below.
 Retiring from the public eye,
 The maiden meek Humility
 Was seen to turn with mildest grace
 To heav'n her thoughts, to earth her face;
 And all unconscious what fair fame
 Merit like hers might well assume,
 Preferr'd to every juster claim
 The lowly Daisy's simple bloom.
 Some bauble each moment arranging,
 Admiring, exploding, or changing,
 The coquet Affectation skimm'd wantonly
 by;
 On her breast a Narcissus she bore,
 As if with Narcissus of yore.
 Heedless of the scorner's joke,
 Smiling at the ruffian's stroke,
 Persevering Patience stood,
 Conqu'ring evil still with good!
 Binding for her brow the while
 Artless wreaths of Camomile,
 Hardy plant whose vigorous shoot
 Springs beneath the trampler's foot.
 Pure constant Love (whose hallow'd fires
 Time still exalts, and truth inspires,
 In spite of absence, grief, or pain)
 Approv'd the faithful Marigold,
 Whose leaves their saffron blaze unfold,
 When first the sun asserts his reign,
 Hail his glad progress through the day,
 Close gradual with his parting ray,
 Nor open, till he shines again.

Superstition came telling her steps and her beads,
 Like Jack-in-a-Bush hung all over with green,
 Agnus Castus by wholesale she cull'd from the meads,
 And stuck with due care Holy Thistle between:
 A chaplet of Monkshood she pluck'd for her
 head,
 And Rosemary sprigs for the graves of the dead.

Tiptoe o'er the level plain,
 Ardent Hope all panting flew;
 Prompt her eager eye to strain
 Far beyond the present view;
 Quick from hint to hint to stray,
 She the Primrose held most dear;
 First-born of returning May,
 Promise of the future year.

Ill-nature to a corner stole,
 And taught her bloodshot eyes to roll,
 As if she long'd to blight
 Each flower of happier scent and hue,
 For none she chose of all that grew,
 Save pois'nous Aconite.

Hand in hand, for they never asunder are seen,
 All cheerful their features, all easy their mien,
 Contentment and Innocence tript it along;
 By the soft virgin Snow-drop was Innocence
 known:

Contentment took Heart-ease, and call'd it her
 own;
 Nor envied the great, nor the gay in the throng.

The throng!—just hint to wild conceit like
 mine;

Why, what a wreath had I begun to twine!
 Indulgent as she was, methinks I hear
 E'en Fancy's self now whisper in my ear,
 "Quit ere 'tis tedious, quit the flowing road,
 Nor what was meant a nosegay, make a load."

§ 205. To a Young Lady, with a Copy of Moore's Fables.

BISHOP.

Books, my dear girl, when well design'd,
 Are moral maps of human kind;
 Where, sketch'd before judicious eyes,
 The road to worth and wisdom lies.
 Serene Philosophy portrays
 The steep, the rough, the thorny ways:
 Cross woods and wilds, the learned tribe,
 A dark and doubtful path describe:
 But Poesy her votaries leads
 O'er level lawns, and verdant meads;
 And if, perchance, in sportful vein,
 Through Fable's scenes she guides her train,
 All is at once enchanted ground,
 All Fancy's garden glitters round.

I, Sally! (who shall long to see,
 In you, how good your sex can be,)
 Before you range with curious speed,
 Where'er that garden's beauties lead;

And mark how Moore could once display
A scene so varied, and so gay!
Beg you, for introduction's sake,
A short excursive trip to take,
O'er one poor plat, unlike the rest,
Which my more humble care hath drest;
Where if a little flowret blows,
From pure affection's root it grows.

A virgin rose, in all the pride
Of spring's luxuriant blushes dy'd,
Above the vulgar flow'rs was rais'd,
And with excess of lustre blaz'd.
In full career of heedless play,
Chance brought a Butterfly that way;
She stopp'd at once her giddy flight,
Proud on so sweet a spot to light;
Spread wide her plumage to the sun,
And thus in fancy-strain begun:
"Why but to soften my repose,
Could nature rear so bright a rose?
Why but on roses to recline,
Make forms so delicate as mine?
Fate destin'd by the same decree,
Me for the rose—the rose for me!"

A tiny Bug, who close between
Th' unfolding bloom had lurk'd unseen,
Heard, and in angry tone address'd
This rude invader of his rest:
"For thee, consummate fool, the rose!
No—to a nobler end it blows:—
The velvet o'er its foliage spread,
Secures to me a downy bed:
So thick its crowding leaves ascend
To hide, to warm me, and defend.
For me those odours they exhale,
Which scent at second-hand the gale;
And give such things as thee to share
What my superior claim can spare!"

While thus the quarrel they pursu'd,
A Bee the petty triflers view'd;
For once reluctant rais'd her head
A moment from her toil, and said,
"Cease, abject an'mals, to contest!
They claim things most who use them best.
Would nature finish works like these,
That butterflies might bask at ease?
Or bugs intrench'd in splendor lie,
Born but to crawl, and dose, and die?
The rose you vainly ramble o'er,
Breathes balmy dews from ev'ry pore;
Which yield their treasur'd sweets alone
To skill and labor like my own:
With sense as keen as yours, I trace
The expanding blossom's glossy grace;
Its shape, its fragrance, and its hue,
But while I trace, improve them too:
Still taste; but still from hour to hour
Bear home new honey from the flow'r."

Conceit may read for mere pretence,
For mere amusement, indolence;
True spirit deems no study right,
Till profit dignify delight.

§ 206. The Library. BISHOP.

HAIL! Contemplation! grave majestic dame,
In thee glad Science greets a parent's name:
Thine is each art of speech, each rapt'rous
strain,

The Graces lead, the Virtues fill thy train!

From all of evil, life or dreads or knows,
Its real trifles, and its fancied woes,
O lead thy votary! pensive, yet serene,
To some lone seat, thy favorite, hallow'd scene,
Where his calm breast may every pow'r employ,

Feel self-born peace and independent joy.

And see! the Library my steps invites;
Fraught with true profit and with pure delights:

Calls to a feast, whose elegance and love,
The man must relish, and the heart approve.

How awful is the spot!—each honor'd name,
Each theme of modern praise, and early fame;
Bards, statesmen, sages, lov'd, rever'd, ad-
mir'd,

Whom sense enlighten'd and whom glory
fir'd,

Rise to my view, still sweet, still great, still
bold,

Alive in pow'r, and active, as of old.

Yes! wasteful time! here, here, thy rage is vain!

Away! fond boaster! Genius scorns thy reign.

The poet here, whom gen'rous transport rais'd,

Survives coëval with the worth he prais'd.

If deeds exalted gave his breast to glow,

Or pity bade him sympathize with woe;

If sweetly soft he chose the lover's part,

Or truth to satire urg'd his honest heart;

His verse still lives, his sentiment still warms,

His lyre still warbles, and his wit still charms.

Here by the past to form the rising age,

The grave historian spreads his ample page;

Whose faithful care preserves the hero's fame,

Or damns to infamy the traitor's name;

Whose records bid fair virtue ever live,

And share immortal in the life they give.

Here the firm patriot, on whose winning
tongue

The snow-soft dews of mild persuasion hung,

Who knew to lead in spirit, and control

The ductile passions, and usurp the soul;

Still pleads, still rules; now lively, now severe,

Exalts the purpose, or commands the tear.

Here the firm friends of science, and of man,

Who taught new arts, or open'd nature's plan;

Who each improv'd, or drew from both com-
bin'd,

Health to the body, vigor to the mind;

Who bade mankind to nobler aims arise,

More good, more just, more happy, or more
wise;

Shine, deathless, as the bliss their toil pro-
cur'd,

While mem'ry pays the debt desert ensur'd.

In such lov'd sport (if fortune deign'd to smile),
Calm let me live, and ev'ry care beguile;
Hold converse with the great of every time,
The learn'd of ev'ry class—the good of ev'ry clime.

There better still, as wiser grow: and there
(Tis just ambition, though 'tis hopeless pray'r)
Still found, like them, on real worth my claim,
And catch their merit to partake their fame.

§ 207. Water. BISHOP.

If right ἀριστον ἔδωκε Pindar sings,
That simple Water is the best of things,
Would Water-poets were the best of bards!
But, Oh! that chance is not upon the cards!
Vain were th' attempt such logic to apply;
My verse would give my arguments the lie.—
Yet what I can I will:—not he whose lyre
Leads on the Aonian mount the sister choir, (Though all the inspiring potions he explore,
From Water up to Nectar) can no more.
From earth's deep wound—for earth their store supplies—

Through countless pores the moist effluvia rise,
Distinct below, where oozing strata shed
Drop after drop; till from their humid bed
Th' emergent vapors steam; and as they go,
Condense, incorporate, extend, and flow.
—Thanks, kind Philosophy! whose lore profound

Thus helps me bring my Water above ground.
Henceforth to trace it, little will suffice,
Obvious to common sense, and common eyes.

If in the mental calm of joy serene,
I seek, through fancy's aid, the sylvan scene,
There Water meets me, by the pebbled side
Of sedgy-fringed brooks, expanding wide
In dimpled eddies—or with murmurs shrill,
Running sweet unisons, where responsive still
In cadence meet, impending aspens hail
Heav'n's mildest breath, soft quiv'ring to the gale.

Too charming visions of intense delight!
Why? whither vanish ye? Her eagle flight
Fancy renews; and full athwart mine eye
'Throws an enormous cataract:—from on high,
In awful stillness deep'ning Waters glide,
E'en to the rude rock's ridge abrupt, then slide
Pond'rous down, down the void; and pitch below

In thunders:—Dash'd to foam, a while they know

No certain current; till again combin'd,
In boiling tides along the waves they wind.
Oh! bear me hence, where Water's force displays

More useful energy; where classic praise
Adorns the names of chiefs long dead, who brought

Through channel'd rocks concentrating streams, and taught

One aqueduct divided lands to lave,
And hostile realms to drink one common wave.

But soft—methinks some horrid sounds I hear!

What throbbing passion speaks?—'Tis fear,
'tis fear.

Water where yonder spout to heav'n ascends,
Rides in tremendous triumphs; Ocean bends;
And ruin raising high her baleful head,
Broods o'er the waste, the bursting mass will spread.

Enough of wat'ry wonders:—all dismay'd
E'en Fancy starts at forms herself hath made.
Let them whom terror can inspire, pursue
Themes too terrific: I with humble view,
Retire unequal, nor will e'er again
To Water's greater works devote my strain;
Content to praise it, when with gentle sway,
Profuse of rich increase, it winds its way
Through the parch'd glebe; or fills with influence bland

The cup of temperance in the peasant's hand.

§ 208. On Instruments of Music. BISHOP.

WHERE health and high spirits awaken the morn,
And dash through the dews that impearl the rough thorn,
To shouts and to cries
Shrill Echo replies,
While the horn prompts the shout, and the shout greets the horn.

Loud across the upland ground,
Sweetly mellowing down the vale,
The changeful bells ring jocund round
Where joy bestrides the gale;
Herald eager to proclaim
The lover's bliss, or hero's fame.

Shall the fiddle's sprightly strain,
In pleasure's realms our feet detain,
Where youth and beauty, in the dance,
Borrow new charms from elegance?

Or shall we stray,
Where stately through the public way,
Amidst the trumpet's clangors, and th' acclaim
Of civic zeal, in long procession move
Nobles and chiefs of venerable fame;
Or haply sovereign majesty displays
To public view the lustre of its rays,
And proves at once, and wins, a nation's love?

Hark! how the solemn organ calls
Attention's sober ears to hallow'd walls,
Where meek, yet warm, beneath the temple's
Devotion seeks, with stedfast eyes, [shade,
The God whose glories every gloom pervade,
To whom for ever prayer is made,
And daily praises rise.

What notes, in swiftest cadence running,
Through many a maze of varied measure,
Mingled by the master's cunning,
Give th' alarm to festive pleasure?
Cambria, 'twas thy harps of old
Each gallant heart's recess explor'd,
Announcing feats of chieftains bold,
To grace the hospitable board.

Mark how the soldier's eye
Looks proud defiance! How his heart beats
high,
With glorious expectation! What inspires,
What fans his martial fires?
What but the power of sound?
The clam'rous drums his anxious ardor raise,
His blood flows quicker round;
At once he hears, he feels, enjoys, obeys.
Where gathering storms incessant lower,
And niggard nature chills th' abortive grain,
From her bleak heights see Scotland pour
Blithe lads and lasses trim; a hardy train,
Down the crag, and o'er the lea,
Following still with hearty glee,
The bagpipe's mellow minstrelsy.
Where cloudless suns, with glowing dyes,
Tinge Italy's serener skies,
Soft the winding lawns along
The lover's lute complains;
While ling'ring Echo learns the song,
Gives it the woods; and, loth to lose
One accent of the impassion'd muse,
Bids woods return it to the plains.
Time was, when, stretch'd beneath the beechen
shade,
The simple shepherd warbled his sweet lay;
Lur'd to his rustic reed, the gentle maid Welcom'd the morn, and caroll'd down the day.
Why do our swains depart from ancient lore?
Why sounds no pastoral reed on Britain's shore?
—The innocence which tun'd it is no more!

§ 209. The Art of Dancing. Inscribed to the Rt. Honorable the Lady Fanny Fielding.

IN the smooth dance to move with graceful
mien,
Easy with care, and sprightly, though serene,
To mark th' instructions echoing strains convey,
And with just steps each tuneful note obey,
I teach; be present, all ye sacred choir,
Blow the soft lute, and strike the sounding
lyre;
When Fielding bids, your kind assistance bring,
And at her feet the lowly tribute fling;
Oh, may her eyes (to her this verse is due)
What first themselves inspir'd vouchsafe to view.
Hail, loftiest art! thou canst all hearts ensnare,
And make the fairest still appear more fair;
Beauty can little execution do,
Unless she borrows half her charms from you!
Few, like Pygmalion, doat on lifeless charms,
Or care to clasp a statue in their arms;
But breasts of flint must melt with fierce desire,
When art and motion wake the sleeping fire.
A Venus drawn by great Apelles' hand
May for a while our wond'ring eyes command;
But still, tho' form'd with all the pow'rs of art,
The lifeless piece can never warm the heart:
So fair a nymph, perhaps, may please the eye,
Whilst all her beauteous limbs unactive lie;
But when her charms are in the dance display'd,
Then every heart adores the lovely maid;

This sets her beauty in the fairest light,
And shows each grace in full perfection bright;
Then, as she turns around, from every part,
Like porcupines, she sends a piercing dart:
In vain, alas! the fond spectator tries
To shun the pleasing dangers of the eyes,
For, Parthian-like, she wounds as sure behind
With flowing curls, on ivory neck reclin'd.
Whether her steps the minuet's mazes trace,
Or the slow Louvre's more majestic pace;
Whether the rigadon employs her care,
Or sprightly jig displays the nimble fair;
At ev'ry step new beauties we explore,
And worship now what we admir'd before.
So when Æneas, in the Tyrian grove,
Fair Venus met, the charming queen of love,
The beauteous goddess, whilst unmov'd she
stood,
Seem'd some fair nymph, the guardian of the
wood;
But when she mov'd, at once her heavenly mien,
And graceful step, confess'd bright beauty's
queen:
New glories o'er her form each moment rise,
And all the goddess opens to his eyes.
Now haste, my muse, pursue thy destin'd way;
What dresses best become the dancer say;
The rules of dress forget not to impart,
A lesson precious to the dancing art.
The soldier's scarlet glowing from afar,
Shows that his bloody occupation's war;
Whilst the lawn band, beneath the double chin,
As plainly speaks divinity within;
The milk-maid safe through driving rains and snows,
Wrapp'd in her cloak and propp'd on pattens,
goes;
Whilst the soft belle, immur'd in velvet chair,
Needs but the silken shoe, and trusts her bosom bare.
The woolly drab, and English broad-cloth
warm, [storm;
Guard well the horseman from the beating
But load the dancer with too great a weight,
And call from every pore the dewy sweat.
Rather let him his active limbs display
In camblets thin, or glossy paduasoy.
Let no unwieldy pride his shoulders press,
But airy, light, and easy, be his dress;
Thin be his yielding sole, and low his heel,
So shall he nimbly bound, and safely wheel.
But let not precepts known my verse prolong,
Precepts which use will better teach than song;
For why should I the gallant spark command
With clean white gloves to fit his ready hand?
Or in his fob enlivening spirits wear,
And pungent salts to raise the fainting fair?
Or hint the sword that dangles at his side,
Should from its silken bandage be untied?
Why should my lays the youthful tribe advise,
Lest snowy clouds from out their wigs arise?
So shall their partners mourn their laces spoil'd,
And shining silks with greasy powder soil'd.
Nor need I, sure, bid prudent youths beware,
Lest with erected tongues their buckles stare:
The pointed steel shall oft their stocking rend,
And oft the approaching petticoat offend.

And now, ye youthful fair, I sing to you,
With pleasing smiles my useful labors view :
For you the silk-worms fine-wrought webs display,

And lab'ring spin their little lives away ;
For you bright gems with radiant colors glow,
Fair as the dyes that paint the heavenly bow ;
For you the sea resigns its pearly store,
And earth unlocks her mines of treasur'd ore ;
In vain yet nature thus her gifts bestows,
Unless yourselves with art those gifts dispose.

Yet think not, nymphs, that in the glitt'ring ball,
One form of dress prescrib'd can suit with all ;
One brightest shines when wealth and art combine

To make the finish'd piece completely fine :
When least adorn'd, another steals our hearts,
And, rich in native beauties, wants not arts.
In some are such resistless graces found,
That in all dresses they are sure to wound ;
Their perfect forms all foreign aids despise,
And gems but borrow lustre from their eyes.

Let the fair nymph, in whose plump cheek is seen

A constant blush, be clad in cheerful green ;
In such a dress the sportive sea-nymphs go,
So in their grassy beds fresh roses blow :
The lass whose skin is like the hazel brown,
With brighter yellow should o'ercome her own ;
While maids grown pale with sickness or despair,

The sable's mournful dye should choose to wear :
So the pale moon still shines with purest light,
Cloth'd in the dusky mantle of the night.

But far from you be all those treach'rous arts,
That wound with painted charms unwary hearts ;

Dancing's a touchstone that true beauty tries,
Nor suffers charms that nature's hand denies :
Though for a while we may with wonder view
The rosy blush and skin of lovely hue,
Yet soon the dance will cause the cheeks to glow,

And melt the waxen lips and neck of snow.
So shine the fields in icy fetters bound,
Whilst frozen gems bespangle all the ground ;
Thro' the clear crystal of the glitt'ring snow,
With scarlet die the blushing hawthorns glow ;
O'er all the plains unnumber'd glories rise,
And a new bright creation charms our eyes,
Till Zephyr breathes, then all at once decay
The splendid scenes, the glories fade away ;
The fields resign the beauties not their own,
And all their snowy charms run trickling down.

Dare I in such momentous points advise,
I should condemn the hoop's enormous size.
Of ills I speak by long experience found :
Oft have I trod th' unmeasurable round,
And mourn'd my shins bruised black with many a wound.

Nor should the tighten'd stays, too straitly lac'd

In whalebone bondage, gall the slender waist ;
Nor waving lappets should the dancing fair,
Nor ruffles edged with dangling fringes, wear ;

Oft will the cobweb-ornaments catch hold
On the approaching button rough with gold ;
Nor force, nor art, can then the bonds divide,
When once th' entangled Gordian knot is tied :
So the unhappy pair, by Hymen's pow'r
Together join'd in some ill-fated hour,
The more they strive their freedom to regain,
The faster binds th' indissoluble chain.

Let each fair maid, who fears to be disgraced,
Ever be sure to tie her garter fast,
Lest the loose string, amidst the public ball,
A wish'd-for prize to some proud fop should fall,
Who the rich treasure shall triumphant show,
And with warm blushes cause her cheek to glow.

But yet (as Fortune by the self-same ways
She humbles many, some delights to raise)
It happen'd once, a fair illustrious dame
By such neglect acquired immortal fame :
And thence the radiant star and garter blue,
Britannia's noble grace, if fame says true ;
Hence still, Plantagenet, thy beauties bloom,
Though long since moulder'd in the dusky tomb ;

Still thy lost garter is thy sovereign's care,
And what each royal breast is proud to wear.

But let me now my lovely charge remind,
Lest they forgetful leave their fans behind :
Lay not, ye fair, the pretty toy aside,
A toy at once display'd for use and pride ;
A wondrous engine, that by magic charms
Cools your own breasts, and every other's warms.

What daring hand shall e'er attempt to tell
The powers that in this little weapon dwell ?
What verse can e'er explain its various parts,
Its numerous uses, motions, charms, and arts ?
Its painted folds, that oft, extended wide,
Th' afflicted fair one's blubber'd beauties hide,
When secret sorrows her sad bosom fill,
If Strephon is unkind, or Shock is ill :
Its sticks, on which her eyes dejected pore,
And pointing fingers number o'er and o'er,
When the kind virgin burns with secret shame,
Dies to consent, yet fears to own her flame ;
Its shake triumphant, its victorious clap,
Its angry flutter, and its wanton tap.

Forbear, my muse, th' extensive theme to sing,

Nor trust in such a flight thy tender wing ;
Rather do you in humble lines proclaim
From whence this engine took its form and name ;

Say from what cause it first deriv'd its birth,
How form'd in heav'n, how thence deduced to earth.

Once in Arcadia, that fam'd seat of love,
There liv'd a nymph, the pride of all the grove,

A lovely nymph, adorn'd with every grace,
An easy shape and sweetly-blooming face ;
Fanny the damsel's name, as chaste as fair,
Each virgin's envy, and each swain's despair.
To charm her ear the rival shepherds sing,
Blow the soft flute, and wake the trembling string ;

For her they leave the wand'ring flocks to rove, Whilst Fanny's name resounds through every
   grove,
 And spreads on every tree, enclos'd in knots
   of love;
 As Fielding's now, her eyes all hearts inflame,
 Like her in beauty as alike in name.
 'Twas when the summer's sun, now mounted
   high,
 With fiercer beams had scorch'd the glowing
 Beneath the covert of a cooling shade, [sky,
 To shun the heat this lovely nymph was laid:
 The sultry weather o'er her cheeks had spread
 A blush that added to her native red,
 And her fair breast, as polish'd marble white,
 Was half conceal'd and half expos'd to sight:
 Æolus, mighty god whom winds obey,
 Observ'd the beauteous maid as thus she lay,
 O'er all her charms he gaz'd with fond delight,
 And suck'd in poison at the dangerous sight.
 He sighs, he burns, at last declares his pain,
 But still he sighs, and still he woos in vain;
 The cruel nymph, regardless of his moan,
 Minds not his flame, uneasy with her own,
 But still complains that he who rul'd the air,
 Would not command one zephyr to repair
 Around her face; nor gentle breeze to play
 Through the dark vale, to soothe the sultry day.
 By love incited, and the hopes of joy,
 Th' ingenious god contriv'd this pretty toy,
 With gales incessant to relieve her flame;
 And call'd it Fan, from lovely Fanny's name.

CANTO II.

Now see, prepar'd to lead the sprightly dance,
 The lovely nymphs and well-dress'd youths
   advance;
 The spacious room receives its jovial guest,
 And the floor shakes with pleasing weight
   oppress'd;
 Thick rang'd on every side, with various dies,
 The fair in glossy silks our sight surprise:
 So in a garden bath'd with genial show'rs,
 A thousand sorts of variegated flow'rs,
 Jonquils, carnations, pinks, and tulips rise,
 And in a gay confusion charm our eyes.
 High o'er their heads with num'rous candles
   bright,
 Large sconces shed their sparkling beams of
   light,
 Their sparkling beams that still more brightly
   flow,
 Reflected back from gems and eyes below.
 Unnumber'd fans to cool the crowded fair,
 With breathing zephyrs, move the circling air.
 The sprightly fiddle, and the sounding lyre,
 Each youthful breast with gen'rous warmth
   inspire;
 Fraught with all joys, the blissful moments fly,
 Whilst music melts the ear, and beauty charms
   the eye.

Now let the youth to whose superior place
 It first belongs the splendid ball to grace,
 With humble bow, and ready hand prepare,
 Forth from the crowd to lead his chosen fair;
 The fair shall not his kind regard deny,
 But to the pleasing toil with ardor fly.

But stay, rash pair, nor yet untaught advance,
 First hear the muse ere you attempt to dance.

* By art directed, o'er the foaming tide
 Secure from rocks the painted vessels glide;
 By art the chariot scours the dusty plain,
 Springs at the whip, and hears the straight'ning
   rein †;

To art our bodies must obedient prove,
 If e'er we hope with graceful ease to move.

Long was the dancing art unfix'd and free,
 Hence lost in error and uncertainty;
 No precepts did it mind, or rules obey,
 But ev'ry master taught a different way:
 Hence, ere each new-born dance was fully tried,
 The lovely product, e'en in blooming, died.
 Through various hands in wild confusion toss'd,
 Its steps were alter'd, and its beauties lost;
 Till Fuillet ‡, the pride of Gallia, rose,
 And did the dance in characters compose;
 Each lovely grace by certain marks he taught,
 And every step in lasting volumes wrote:
 Hence o'er the world this pleasing art shall
   spread,

And ev'ry dance in ev'ry clime be read;
 By distant masters shall each step be seen,
 Though mountains rise, and oceans roar between:

Hence with her sister arts shall Dancing claim
 An equal right to universal fame;
 And Isaac's rigadoon shall live as long
 As Raphael's painting, or as Virgil's song.

Wise Nature ever with a prudent hand
 Dispenses various gifts to ev'ry land,
 To every nation frugally imparts
 A genius fit for some peculiar arts.
 To trade the Dutch incline, the Swiss to arms,
 Music and verse are soft Italia's charms:
 Britannia justly glories to have found
 Land unexplor'd, and sail'd the globe around:
 But none will sure presume to rival France,
 Whether she forms or executes the dance;
 To her exalted genius 'tis we owe
 The sprightly Rigadoon, and Louvre slow;
 The Borée, and Courant, unpractis'd long,
 Th' immortal Minuet, and the smooth Bretagne,

With all the dances of illustrious fame,
 That from their native country take their name;
 With these let ev'ry ball be first begun,
 Nor country-dance intrude 'till these are done.

Each cautious bard, ere he attempts to sing,
 First gently flutt'ring tries his tender wing,
 And if he finds that with uncommon fire
 The muses all his raptur'd soul inspire,
 At once to heaven he soars in lofty odes,
 And sings alone of heroes and of gods:

* Arte citæ veloque rates remoque moventur,
 Arte leves currus.

† —Nec audit currus habenas.

‡ Fuillet wrote the Art of Dancing by Characters, in French, since translated by Weaver.

But if he trembling fears a flight so high,
He then descends to softer elegy;
And if in elegy he can't succeed,
In past'ral he may tune the oaten reed.
So should the dancer ere he tries to move,
With care his strength, and weight, and genius
prove;

Then if he finds kind nature's gifts impart
Endowments proper for the dancing art,
If in himself he finds together join'd
An active body and ambitious mind,
In nimble Rigadoons he may advance,
Or in the Louvre's slow majestic dance:
If these he fears to reach with easy pace,
Let him the minuet's circling mazes trace:
Is this too hard, this too let him forbear,
And to the country-dance confine his care.

Would you in dancing ev'ry fault avoid,
To keep true time be first your thoughts em-
ploy'd;

All other errors they in vain shall mend,
Who in this one important point offend;
For this, when now united hand in hand,
Eager to start the youthful couple stand,
Let them a while their nimble feet restrain,
And with soft taps beat time to every strain:
So for the race prepar'd two coursers stand,
And with impatient pawings spurn the sand.

In vain a master shall employ his care,
Where nature once has fix'd a clumsy air;
Rather let such, to country sports confin'd,
Pursue the flying hare, or tim'rous hind;
Nor yet, while I the rural squire despise,
A mien effeminate would I advise;
With equal scorn I would the fop deride,
Nor let him dance—but on the woman's side.

And you, fair nymphs, avoid with equal care
A stupid dullness, and a coquet air.
Neither with eyes that ever love the ground,
Asleep, like spinning tops, run round and round;
Nor yet with giddy looks, and wanton pride,
Stare all around, and skip from side to side.

True dancing, like true wit, is best express'd
By nature only, to advantage dress'd;
'Tis not a nimble bound, or caper high,
That can pretend to please a curious eye;
Good judges no such tumbler's tricks regard,
Or think them beautiful because they're hard:
'Tis not enough that every stander-by
No glaring errors in your steps can spy;
The dance and music must so nicely meet,
Each note should seem an echo to your feet;
A nameless grace must in each movement
dwell,

Which words can ne'er express, or precepts
tell;

Not to be taught, but ever to be seen
In Flavia's air, and Chloe's easy mien:
'Tis such an air that makes her thousands fall,
When Fielding dances at a birth-night ball:
Smooth as Camilla she skims o'er the plain,
And flies like her through clouds of heroes slain.

Now when the minuet, oft repeated o'er,
(Like all terrestrial joys) can please no more,
And ev'ry nymph refusing to expand
Her charms, declines the circulating hand,

Then let the jovial country-dance begin,
And the loud fiddles call each straggler in;
But ere they come, permit me to disclose
How first, as legends tell, this pastime rose:—

In ancient times (such times are now no more)

When Albion's crown illustrious Arthur wore,
In some fair opening glade each summer's night,
Where the pale moon diffus'd her silver light,
On the soft carpet of a grassy field,
The sporting fairies their assemblies held:
Some lightly tripping with their pigmy queen,
La circling ringlets mark'd their level green;
Some with soft notes bade mellow pipes resound,
And music warbled through the groves around:
Oft lonely shepherds by the forest side,
Belated peasants oft, their revels spied,
And home returning, o'er the nut-brown ale
Their guest diverted with the wondrous tale.
Instructed hence, throughout the British isle,
And fond to imitate the pleasing toil,
Round where the trembling May-pole's fix'd
on high,

And bears its flow'ry honors to the sky,
The ruddy maids and sun-burnt swains resort,
And practise ev'ry night the lovely sport.
On ev'ry side Æolian artists stand,
Whose active elbows swelling winds command;
The swelling winds harmonious pipes inspire,
And blow in ev'ry breast a gen'rous fire.

Thus taught at first the country-dance began,
And hence to cities and to courts it ran;
Succeeding ages did in time impart
Various improvements to the lovely art:
From fields and groves to palaces remov'd,
Great ones the pleasing exercise approv'd:
Hence the loud fiddle and shrill trumpet's sounds

Are made companions of the dancer's bounds;
Hence gems and silks, brocades and ribands
join,

To make the ball with perfect lustre shine.
So rude at first the tragic muse appear'd,
Her voice alone by rustic rabble heard;
Where twisting trees a cooling arbour made,
The pleas'd spectators sat beneath the shade,
The homely stage with rushes green was strew'd,
And in a cart the strolling actors rode;
Till time at length improv'd the great design,
And bade the scenes with painted landscapes
shine:

Then art did all the bright machines dispose,
And theatres of Parian marble rose;
Then mimic thunder shook the canvas sky,
And gods descended from their towers on high.

With caution now let ev'ry youth prepare
To choose a partner from the mingled fair:
Vain would be here th' instructing muse's voice,
If she pretended to direct his choice:
Beauty alone by fancy is express'd,
And charms in diff'rent forms each diff'rent
breast:

A snowy skin this am'rous youth admires,
Whilst nut-brown cheeks another's bosom fires:
Small waist and slender limbs some hearts insnare,

While others love the more substantial fair.

But let not outward charms your judgement
sway,

Your reason rather than your eyes obey,
And in the dance, as in the marriage noose,
Rather for merit than for beauty choose:
Be her your choice, who knows with perfect
skill

When she should move, and when she should be still:

Who uninstructed can perform her share,
And kindly half the pleasing burthen bear.
Unhappy is that hopeless wretch's fate
Who, fetter'd in the matrimonial state,
With a poor, simple, unexperienc'd wife,
Is forc'd to lead the tedious dance of life;
And such is his, with such a partner join'd,
A moving puppet, but without a mind:
Still must his hand be pointing out the way,
Yet ne'er can teach so fast as she can stray;
Beneath her follies he must ever groan,
And ever blush for errors not his own.

But now behold, united hand in hand,
Rang'd on each side the well-pair'd couple
stand,

Each youthful bosom beating with delight,
Waits the brisk signal for the pleasing sight;
While lovely eyes that flash unusual rays,
And snowy bosoms seen above the stays,
Quick busy hands and bridling heads declare
The fond impatience of the starting fair.
And see, the sprightly dance is now begun!
Now here, now there, the giddy maze they run;
Now with slow steps they pace the circling ring,
Now all confus'd too swift for sight they spring:
So in a wheel with rapid fury toss'd,
The undistinguish'd spokes are in the motion
lost.

The dancer here no more requires a guide,
To no strict steps his nimble feet are tied;
The muse's precepts here would useless be,
Where all is fancied, unconfin'd, and free.
Let him but to the music's voice attend,
By this instructed he can ne'er offend.
If to his share it falls the dance to lead,
In well-known paths he may be sure to tread;
If others lead let him their motions view,
And in their steps the winding maze pursue.

In every country-dance a serious mind
Turn'd for reflection, can a moral find.
In Hunt-the-squirrel, thus the nymph we view,
Seeks when we fly, but flies when we pursue:
Thus in round dances, where our partners
change,

And unconfin'd from fair to fair we range,
As soon as one from his own consort flies,
Another seizes on the lovely prize;
A while the fav'rite youth enjoys her charms,
Till the next comer steals her from his arms;
New ones succeed, the last is still her care:
How true an emblem of th' inconstant fair!

Where can philosophers and sages wise,
Who read the curious volumes of the skies,
A model more exact than dancing name,
Of the creation's universal frame?
Where worlds unnumber'd o'er th' ethereal
way,
In a bright regular confusion stray;

Now here, now there, they whirl along the sky,
Now near approach, and now far distant fly:
Now meet in the same order they begun,
And then the great celestial dance is done.

Where can the moralist find a juster plan
Of the vain labors of the life of man?
A while through justling crowds we toil and sweat,

And eagerly pursue we know not what;
Then, when our trifling short-liv'd race is run,
Quite tir'd, sit down just where we have begun.

Though to your arms kind fate's indulgent
Has giv'n a partner exquisitely fair, [care
Let not her charms so much engage your heart,
That you neglect the skilful dancer's part;
Be not, when you the tuneful notes should hear,
Still whispering idle prattle in her ear;
When you should be employ'd be not at play,
Nor for your joys all others' steps delay:
But when the finish'd dance you once have done,
And with applause through every couple run,
There rest a while: there snatch the fleeting bliss,

The tender whisper, and the balmy kiss;
Each secret wish, each softer hope confess,
And her moist palm with easy fingers press:
With smiles the fair shall hear your warm desires,

When music melts her soul, and dancing fires.
Thus mix'd with love, the pleasing toil pursue
Till the unwelcome morn appears in view;
Then when approaching day its beams displays,
And the dull candle shines with fainter rays,
Then when the sun just rises o'er the deep,
And each bright eye is almost set in sleep,
With ready hands, obsequious youths, prepare,
Safe to her coach to lead each chosen fair,
And guard her from the morn's inclement air:
Let a warm hood enwrap her lovely head,
And o'er her neck a handkerchief be spread;
Around her shoulders let this arm be cast,
Whilst that from cold defends her slender waist;
With kisses warm her balmy lips shall glow,
Unchill'd by nightly damps or wintry snow,
While gen'rous white wine mull'd with ginger
warm,

Safely protects her inward frame from harm.

But ever let my lovely pupils fear
To chill their mantling blood with cold small-beer;

Ah, thoughtless fair! the tempting draught refuse,

When thus forewarn'd by my experienc'd muse;
Let the sad consequence your thoughts employ,
Nor hazard future pains, for present joy;
Destruction lurks within the pois'nous dose,
A fatal fever, or a pimpled nose.

Thus through each precept of the dancing
art,

The muse has play'd the kind instructor's part;
Through ev'ry maze her pupil she has lead,
And pointed out the surest paths to tread:
No more remains; no more the goddess sings,
But drops her pinions and unfurls her wings.
On downy beds the weary dancers lie,
And sleep's silk cords tie down each drowsy
eye;

Delightful dreams their pleasing sports restore,
And e'en in sleep they seem to dance once more.

And now the work completely finish'd lies,
Which the devouring teeth of time defies.
While birds in air, or fish in streams we find,
Or damsels fret with aged partners join'd,
As long as nymphs shall with attentive ear
A fiddle rather than a sermon hear,
So long the brightest eyes shall oft peruse
The useful lines of my instructive muse,
Each belle shall wear them wrote upon her fan,
And each bright beau shall read them—if he can.

§ 210. Whitsuntide. Written at Winchester College, on the immediate Approach of the Holidays.

HENCE, thou fur-clad Winter, fly;
Sire of shivering poverty!
Who, as thou creep'st with chilblains lame
To the crowded charcoal flame,
With chattering teeth and ague cold,
Scarce thy shaking sides canst hold
Whilst thou draw'st the deep cough out:
God of foot-ball's noisy rout,
Tumult loud and boisterous play,
The dang'rous slide; the snow-ball fray.

But come, thou genial son of Spring,
Whitsuntide, and with thee bring
Cricket, nimble boy and light,
In slippers red and drawers white;
Who o'er the nicely-measur'd land
Ranges around his comely band,
Alert to intercept each blow,
Each motion of the wary foe.

Or patient take thy quiet stand,
The angle trembling in thy hand,
And mark, with penetrative eye,
Kissing the wave, the frequent fly:
Where the trout with eager spring
Forms the many-circled ring,
And, leaping from the silver tide,
Turns to the sun his speckled side.

Or lead where health, a Naiad fair,
With rosy cheek and dropping hair,
From the sultry noon-tide beam,
Dives in Itchin's crystal stream.
Thy vot'ries, rang'd in order due,
To-morrow's wish'd-for dawn shall view,
Greeting the radiant star of light
With matin hymn and early kite:
E'en now, these hallow'd haunts among,
To thee we raise the choral song;
And swell with echoing minstrelsy
The strain of joy and liberty.

If pleasures such as these await
Thy genial reign, with heart elate
For thee I throw my gown aside,
And hail thy coming, Whitsuntide.

§ 211. Christmas. ROBERTS.

HENCE, Summer, indolently laid
To sleep beneath the cooling shade!
Panting quick with sultry heat,
Thirst and faint fatigue, retreat!

Come, Christmas, father thou of mirth,
Patron of the festive hearth,
Around whose social evening flame
The jovial song, the winter game,
The chase renew'd in merry tale,
The season's carols, never fail:
Who, though the winter chill the skies,
Canst catch the glow of exercise,
Following swift the foot-ball's course;
Or with unresisted force,
Where frost arrests the harden'd tide,
Shooting 'cross the rapid slide;
Who, ere the misty morn is gray,
To some high covert hark'st away,
While Sport, on lofty courser borne,
In concert winds his echoing horn
With the deeply thund'ring hounds,
Whose clangor wild, and joyful sounds,
While echo swells the doubling cry,
Shake the woods with harmony.
How does my eager bosom glow
To give the well-known tally-ho!
Or show, with cap inverted, where
Stole away the cautious hare.
Or, if the blast of winter keen
Spangles o'er the silvery green,
Booted high thou lov'st to tread,
Marking, through the sedgy mead,
Where the creeping moor-hen lies,
Or snipes with sudden twittering rise;
Or joy'st the early walk to take
Where through the pheasant-haunted brake,
Oft as the well-aim'd gun resounds,
The eager-dashing spaniel bounds.

For thee of buck my breeches tight,
Clanging whip, and rowels bright,
The hunter's cap my brows to guard,
And suit of sportive green's prepar'd;
For since these delights are thine,
Christmas, with thy bands I join.

§ 212. An Elegy on the Death of a mad Dog.
GOLDSMITH.

Good people all, of every sort,
Give ear unto my song,
And if you find it wondrous short,
It cannot hold you long.

In Islington there was a man,
Of whom the world might say,
That still a godly race he ran,
Whene'er he went to pray.

A kind and gentle heart he had,
To comfort friends and foes;
The naked every day he clad,
When he put on his clothes.

And in that town a dog was found,
As many dogs there be,
Both mongrel, puppy, whelp, and hound,
And curs of low degree.

This dog and man at first were friends;
But, when a pique began,
The dog, to gain his private ends,
Went mad and bit the man.

Around from all the neighbouring streets
The wondering neighbours ran,
And swore the dog had lost his wits,
To bite so good a man.

The wound it seem'd both sore and sad
To ev'ry Christian eye;
And while they swore the dog was mad,
They swore the man would die.

But soon a wonder came to light,
That show'd the rogues they lied;
The man recover'd of the bite,
The dog it was that died.

§ 213. L'Allegro; or FUN, a Parody.
HUDDERSFIELD.

OFF, blubbering Melancholy!
Of the blue devils and book-learning born,
In dusty schools forlorn;
Amongst black-gowns, square caps, and books
unjolly,
Hunt out some college cell,
Where muzzing quizzes mutter monkish schemes,
And the old proctor dreams;
There, in thy smutty walls o'errun with dock,
As ragged as thy smock,
With rusty, fusty fellows ever dwell.

But come, thou baggage, fat and free,
By gentles call'd Festivity,
And by us rolling kiddies, FUN,
Whom mother Shipton, one by one,
With two Wapping wenches more,
To skipping Harlequino bore:
Or whether, as some deeper say,
Jack Pudding on a holiday
Along with Jenny Diver romping,
As he met her once a pumping,
There on heaps of dirt and mortar,
And cinders wash'd in cabbage-water,
Fill'd her with thee a strapping lassie,
So spunky, brazen, bold, and saucy.
Hip! here jade, and bring with thee
Jokes and sniggering jollity,
Christmas gambols, waggish tricks,
Winks, wry faces, licks and kicks,
Such as fall from Moggy's knuckles,
And love to live about her buckles;
Spunk, that hobbling watchmen boxes,
And Horse-laugh hugging both his doxies;
Come, and kick it as you go,
On the stumping hornpipe-toe;
And in thy right-hand haul with thee,
The Mountain brim French Liberty.
And if I give thee puffing due,
Fun, admit me of thy crew,
To pig with her, and pig with thee,
In everlasting frolics free;
To hear the sweep begin his beat,
And squalling startle the dull street,
From his watch-box in the alley
Till the watch at six doth sally;
Then to go, in spite of sleep,
And at the window cry, "Sweep! sweep!"

Through the street-door, or the area,
Or, in the country, through the dairy;
While the dustman, with his din,
Bawls and rings to be let in,
And at the fore, or the back-door,
Slowly plods his jades before.
Oft hearing the sow-gelder's horn
Harshly rouse the snoring morn,
From the side of a large square,
Through the long street grunting far.
Sometimes walking I'll be seen
By Tower-hill, or Moorfields'-green,
Right against Old Bedlam-gate,
Where the mock king begins his state,
Crown'd with straw and rob'd with rags,
Cover'd o'er with jags and tags,
While the keeper near at hand
Bullies those who leave their stand:
And milk maids' screams go through your ears,

And grinders sharpen rusty sheers,
And every crier squalls his cry
Under each window he goes by.
Straight mine eye hath caught new gambols,
While round and round this town it rambles;
Sloppy streets and foggy day,
Where the blundering folks do stray;
Pavements, on whose slippery flags
Swearing coachmen drive their nags;
Barbers jostled 'gainst your side,
Narrow streets, and gutters wide.
Grub-street garrets now it sees,
To the muse open and the breeze,
Where, perhaps, some scribbler hungers,
The hack of neighbouring newsmongers.
Hard by, a tinker's furnace smokes,
From betwixt two pastry-cooks,
Where Dingy Dick and Peggy, met,
Are at their scurvy dinner set,
Of cow-heel, and such cellar messes,
Which the splay-foot Rachael dresses!
And then in haste the shop she leaves,
And with the boy the bellows heaves;
Or if 'tis late and shop is shut,
Scrubs at the pump her face from smut.

Sometimes, all for sights agog,
To t' other end of the town I jog,
When St. James's bells ring round,
And the royal fiddles sound;
When every lord and lady's bum
Jigs it in the drawing-room;
And young and old dance down the tune
In honor of the fourth of June;
Till candles fail and eyes are sore,
Then home we hie to talk it o'er,
With stories told of many a treat,
How Lady Swab the sweetmeats eat;
She was pinch'd and something worse,
And she was fobb'd and lost her purse:
Tell how the drudging Weltjee sweat,
To bake his custards duly set,
When in one night ere clock went seven,
His 'prentice lad had robb'd the oven
Of more than twenty handfuls put in;
Then lies him down, a little glutton,
Stretch'd lumb'ring 'fore the fire, they tell ye,
And bakes the custards in his belly;

Then crop-sick down the stairs he flings,
Before his master's bell yet rings.
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By hoofs and wheels soon lull'd to sleep.

But the city takes me then,
And the hums of busy men,
Where throngs of train-band captains bold
In time of peace fierce meetings hold,
With stores of stock-jobbers, whose lies
Work change of stocks and bankruptcies;
Where bulls and bears alike contend
To get the cash they dare not spend.
Then let aldermen appear,
In scarlet robes, with chandelier,
And city feasts and gluttony,
With balls upon the lord-mayor's day;
Sights that young 'prentices remember,
Sleeping or waking, all November.

Then to the play-houses anon,
If Quick, or Bannister be one;
Or drollest Parsons, child of Drury,
Bawls out his damns with comic fury.
And ever against hum-drum cares,
Sing me some of Dibdin's airs,
Married to his own queer wit,
Such as my shaking sides may split,
In notes with many a jolly bout,
Near Beaufort Buildings oft roar'd out,
With wagging curls and smirk so cunning,
His rig on many a booby running,
Exposing all the ways and phizzes
Of "wags, and oddities, and quizzes;"
That Shuter's self might heave his head
From drunken snoozes, on a bed
Of pot-house benches sprawl'd, and hear
Such laughing songs as won the ear
Of all the town, his slip to cover,
Whene'er he met 'em half-seas over.

Freaks like these if thou canst give,
Fun, with thee I wish to live.

§ 214. The Picture. CUNNINGHAM.

A PORTRAIT, at my lord's command
Completed by a curious hand,
For dabblers in the nice virtù
His lordship set the piece to view,
Bidding their connoisseurships tell
Whether this work was finish'd well:
Why, says the loudest, on my word,
'Tis not a likeness, good my lord;
Nor, to be plain, for speak I must,
Can I pronounce one feature just.
Another effort straight was made,
Another portraiture essay'd;
The judges were again besought
Each to deliver what he thought.
Worse than the first, the critics bawl;
Oh what a mouth! how monstrous small!

Look at the cheeks—how lank and thin!
See, what a most preposterous chin!
After remonstrance made in vain,
I'll, says the painter, once again
(If my good lord vouchsafes to sit)
Try for a more successful hit:
If you'll to-morrow deign to call,
We'll have a piece to please you all.
To-morrow comes—a picture's plac'd
Before those spurious sons of taste—
In their opinions all agree,
This is the vilest of all three.
"Know—to confute your envious pride"
(His lordship from the canvass cried),
"Know—that it is my real face,
Where you could no resemblance trace:
I've tried you by a lucky trick,
And prov'd your genius to the quick;
Void of all judgement, goodness, sense,
Out, ye pretending varlets,—hence!"
The connoisseurs depart in haste,
Despis'd, neglected, and disgrac'd.

§ 215. The Modern Fine Gentleman. Written in the Year 1746.

SOAME JENYNS.

Quale portentum neque militaris
Daunia in latis alit esculetis,
Nec Jubæ tellus generat, leonum
Arida nutrix.

JUST broke from school, pert, impudent, and raw,

Expert in Latin, more expert in taw,
His honor posts o'er Italy and France,
Measures St. Peter's dome, and learns to dance;
Thence, having quick through various countries
flown,

Glean'd all their follies and expos'd his own,
He back returns, a thing so strange all o'er,
As never ages past produc'd before;
A monster of such complicated worth,
As no one single clime could e'er bring forth;
Half atheist, papist, gamester, bubble, rook,
Half fiddler, coachman, dancer, groom, and cook,

Next, because business is now all the vogue,
And who'd be quite polite must be a rogue,
In parliament he purchases a seat,
To make th' accomplish'd gentleman complete.
There safe in self-sufficient impudence,
Without experience, honesty, or sense,
Unknowing in her interest, trade, or laws,
He vainly undertakes his country's cause:
Forth from his lips, prepar'd at all to rail,
Torrents of nonsense burst like bottled ale,
* Though shallow, muddy; brisk, though mighty dull;
Fierce, without strength; o'erflowing, though not full.

* Parody on these lines of Sir John Denham:

Though deep yet clear, though gentle yet not dull,
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

Now quite a Frenchman in his garb and air,
His neck yok'd down with bag and solitaire,
The liberties of Britain he supports,
And storms at placemen, ministers, and courts;
Now in crott greasy hair, and leather breeches,
He loudly bellows out his patriot speeches;
Kings, lords, and commons ventures to abuse,
Yet dares to show those ears he ought to lose.
From hence to White's our virtuous Cato flies,
There sits with countenance erect and wise,
And talks of games of whist, and pig-tail pies;
Plays all the night, nor doubts each law to break
Himself unknowingly has help'd to make;
Trembling and anxious, stakes his utmost groat,
Peeps o'er his cards, and looks as if he thought;
Next morn disowns the losses of the night,
Because the fool would fain be thought a bite.

Devoted thus to politics and cards,
Nor mirth, nor wine, nor women he regards;
So far is ev'ry virtue from his heart,
That not a gen'rous vice can claim a part;
Nay, lest one human passion e'er should move
His soul to friendship, tenderness, or love,
To Figg and Broughton* he commits his
breast,

To steel it to the fashionable test.

Thus, poor in wealth, he labors to no end,
Wretched alone, in crowds without a friend;
Insensible to all that's good or kind,
Deaf to all merit, to all beauty blind;
For love too busy, and for wit too grave,
A harden'd, sober, proud, luxuriant knave;
By little actions striving to be great,
And proud to be, and to be thought, a cheat.

And yet in this, so bad is his success,
That, as his fame improves, his rents grow less,
On parchment wings his acres take their flight,
And his unpeopl'd groves admit the light;
With his estate his interest too is done,
His honest borough seeks a warmer sun;
For him now cash and liquor flows no more,
His independent voters cease to roar;
And Britons soon must want the great defence,
Of all his honesty and eloquence;
But that the gen'rous youth, more anxious grown

For public liberty than for his own,
Marries some jointur'd, antiquated crone;
And boldly, when his country is at stake,
Braves the deep yawning gulf, like Curtius,
for its sake.

Quickly again distress'd for want of coin,
He digs no longer in th' exhausted mine,
But seeks preferment as the last resort,
Cringes each morn at levees, bows at court,
And from the hand he hates, implores support.
The minister, well pleas'd at small expense
To silence so much rude impertinence,
With squeeze and whisper yields to his demands,

And on the venal list enroll'd he stands:
A riband and a pension buy the slave;
This bribes the fool about him, that the knave.
And now arriv'd at his meridian glory,
He sinks apace, despis'd by Whig and Tory;

Of independence now he talks no more,
Nor shakes the senate with his patriot roar:
But silent votes, and with court trappings
hung,
Eyes his own glitt'ring star, and holds his tongue.

In craft political a bankrupt made,
He sticks to gaming, as a surer trade;
Turns downright sharper, lives by sucking
blood,

And grows, in short, the very thing he would:
Hunts out young heirs who have their fortunes spent,

And lends them ready cash at cent. per cent.;
Lays wagers on his own and others' lives,
Fights uncles, fathers, grandmothers, and wives,

Till Death at length, indignant to be made
The daily subject of his sport and trade,
Veils with his sable hand the wretch's eyes,
And, groaning for the betts he loses by't, he dies.

§ 216. An Epistle, written in the Country, to the Right Honorable the Lord Lovelace, then in Town, September 1735. JENYNS.

IN days, my lord, when mother Time,
Though now grown old, was in her prime,
When Saturn first began to rule,
And Jove was hardly come from school,
How happy was a country life!
How free from wickedness and strife!
Then each man liv'd upon his farm,
And thought and did no mortal harm;
On mossy banks fair virgins slept,
As harmless as the flocks they kept;
Then love was all they had to do,
And nymphs were chaste, and swains were
true.

But now, whatever poets write,
'Tis sure, the case is alter'd quite:
Virtue no more in rural plains,
Or innocence, or peace remains;
But vice is in the cottage found,
And country girls are oft unsound;
Fierce party rage each village fires,
With wars of justices and squires;
Attorneys for a barley straw,
Whole ages hamper folks in law;
And every neighbour's in a flame
About their rates, or tithes, or game:
Some quarrel for their hares and pigeons,
And some for difference in religions:
Some hold their parson the best preacher,
The tinker some a better teacher;
These, to the church they fight for strangers,
Have faith in nothing but her dangers;
While those, a more believing people,
Can swallow all things—but a steeple.

But I, my lord, who, as you know,
Care little how these matters go,
And equally detest the strife
And usual joys of country life,

* One, a celebrated prize-fighter; the other, a no less famous boxer.

Have by good fortune little share
Of its diversions, or its care :
For seldom I with squires unite,
Who hunt all day and drink all night, -
Nor reckon wonderful inviting,
A quarter-sessions, or cock-fighting :
But then no farm I occupy,
With sheep to rot, and cows to die ;
Nor rage I much, or much despair,
Though in my hedge I find a snare ;
Nor view I, with due admiration,
All the high honors here in fashion ;
The great commissions of the quorum,
Terrors to all who come before 'em ;
Militia scarlet edg'd with gold,
Or the white staff high-sheriffs hold ;
The representative's caressing,
The judge's bow, the bishops blessing ;
Nor can I for my soul delight
In the dull feast of neighboring knight,
Who, if you send three days before,
In white gloves meets you at the door,
With superfluity of breeding
First makes you sick, and then with feeding :
Or if, with ceremony cloy'd,
You would next time such plagues avoid,
And visit without previous notice,
" John, John, a coach !—I can't think who
'tis,"

My lady cries, who spies your coach
Ere you the avenue approach :
" Lord, how unlucky !—washing-day !
And all the men are in the hay !"
Entrance to gain is something hard,
The dogs all bark, the gates are barr'd ;
The yard's with lines of linen cross'd,
The hall-door's lock'd, the key is lost :
These difficulties all o'ercome,
We reach at length the drawing-room ;
Then there's such trampling over-head,
Madam you'd swear was brought to-bed :
Miss in a hurry bursts her lock,
To get clean sleeves to hide her smock ;
The servants run, the pewter clatters,
My lady dresses, calls, and chatters ;
The cook-maid raves for want of butter,
Pigs squeak, fowls scream, and green geese flutter.

Now after three hours' tedious waiting,
On all our neighbours' faults debating,
And having nine times view'd the garden,
In which there's nothing worth a farthing,
In comes my lady and the pudding ;
" You will excuse, sir, on a sudden"—
Then, that we may have four and four,
The bacon, fowls, and cauliflower
Their ancient unity divide,
The top one graces, one each side ;
And by and by the second course
Comes lagging like a distanc'd horse ;
A salver then to church and king,
The butler sweats, the glasses ring :
The cloth remov'd, the toasts go round,
Bawdy and politics abound ;

And, as the knight more tipsy waxes,
We damn all ministers and taxes.
At last the ruddy sun quite sunk,
The coachman tolerably drunk,
Whirling o'er hillocks, ruts, and stones,
Enough to dislocate one's bones,
We home return, a wondrous token
Of Heaven's kind care, with limbs unbroken.
Afflict us not, ye gods, though sinners,
With many days like this, or dinners !

But if civilities thus tease me,
Nor business nor diversions please me ;
You'll ask, my lord, how time I spend ?
I answer, with a book or friend ;
The circulating hours dividing
'Twixt reading, walking, eating, riding :
But books are still my highest joy,
These earliest please, and latest cloy.
Sometimes o'er distant climes I stray,
By guides experienc'd taught the way ;
The wonder of each region view,
From frozen Lapland to Peru ;
Bound o'er rough seas, and mountains bare,
Yet ne'er forsake my elbow chair.
Sometimes some fam'd historian's pen
Recalls past ages back again ;
Where all I see, through every page,
Is but how men, with senseless rage,
Each other rob, destroy, and burn,
To serve a priest's, a statesman's turn :
Though loaded with a different aim,
Yet always asses much the same.
Sometimes I view with much delight,
Divines their holy game-cocks fight :
Here faith and works, at variance set,
Strive hard who shall the vict'ry get ;
Presbytery and episcopacy,
They fight so long, it would amaze ye :
Here free-will holds a fierce dispute
With reprobation absolute ;
There sense kicks transubstantiation,
And reason pecks at revelation.
With learned Newton now I fly
O'er all the rolling orbs on high,
Visit new worlds, and for a minute
This old one scorn, and all that's in it :
And now with lab'ring Boyle I trace
Nature through every winding maze ;
The latent qualities admire
Of vapors, water, air, and fire ;
With pleasing admiration see
Matter's surprising subtilty ;
As how the smallest lamp displays,
For miles around, its scatter'd rays ;
Or how (the case more to explain)
A fart *, that weighs not half a grain,
The atmosphere will oft perfume
Of a whole spacious drawing-room.

Sometimes I pass a whole long day
In happy indolence away,
In fondly meditating o'er
Past pleasures, and in hoping more ;
Or wander through the fields and woods,
And gardens bath'd in circling floods ;

* See Boyle's Experiments.

There blooming flow'rs with rapture view,
The sparkling gems of morning dew,
Whence in my mind ideas rise
Of Celia's cheeks, and Chloe's eyes.

'Tis thus, my Lord, I, free from strife,
Spend an inglorious country life:
These are the joys I still pursue,
When absent from the town and you;
Thus pass long summer suns away,
Busily idle, calmly gay;
Nor great, nor mean, nor rich, nor poor,
Not having much, nor wishing more;
Except that you, when weary grown
Of all the follies of the town,
And seeing in all public places
The same vain fops and painted faces,
Would sometimes kindly condescend
To visit a dull country friend:
Here you'll be ever sure to meet
A hearty welcome, though no treat;
One who has nothing else to do,
But to divert himself and you:
A house, where quiet guards the door,
No rural wits smoke, drink, and roar;
Choice books, safe horses, wholesome liquor,
Billiards, backgammon, and the vicar.

§ 217. Horace. Book II. Ode 10.
COWPER.

RECEIVE, dear friend, the truths I teach,
So shalt thou live beyond the reach
Of adverse fortune's pow'r:
Not always tempt the distant deep,
Nor always timorously creep
Along the treach'rous shore.

He that holds fast the golden mean,
And lives contentedly between
The little and the great,
Feels not the wants that pinch the poor,
Nor plagues that haunt the rich man's door,
Imbit'ring all his state.

The tallest pines feel most the pow'r
Of wintry blast; the loftiest tow'r
Comes heaviest to the ground:
The bolts that spare the mountain's side
His cloud-capt eminence divide,
And spread the ruin round.

The well-inform'd philosopher
Rejoices with a wholesome fear,
And hopes in spite of pain;
If winter bellow from the north,
Soon the sweet spring comes dancing forth,
And nature laughs again.

What if thine heaven be overcast?
The dark appearance will not last;
Expect a brighter sky:
The God that strings the silver bow
Awakes sometimes the muses too,
And lays his arrows by.

If hindrances obstruct thy way,
Thy magnanimity display,
And let thy strength be seen:
But, oh! if fortune fill thy sail
With more than a propitious gale,
Take half thy canvass in.

§ 218. A Reflection on the foregoing Ode.
COWPER.

AND is this all? Can reason do no more Than bid me shun the deep, and dread the shore?

Sweet moralist! afloat on life's rough sea,
The Christian has an art unknown to thee;
He holds no parley with unmanly fears,
Where duty bids he confidently steers;
Faces a thousand dangers at her call,
And trusting in his God surmounts them all.

§ 219. The Shrubbery. Written in a Time of Affliction.
COWPER.

O HAPPY shades! to me unblest,
Friendly to peace, but not to me;
How ill the scene that offers rest,
And heart that cannot rest, agree!
This glassy stream, that spreading pine,
Those alders quiv'ring to the breeze,
Might soothe a soul less hurt than mine,
And please, if any thing could please.

But fix'd unalterable care
Foregoes not what she feels within;
Shows the same sadness every where,
And slights the season and the scene.

For all that pleas'd in wood or lawn,
While peace possess'd these silent bow'rs,
Her animating smile withdrawn,
Has lost its beauties and its pow'rs.

The saint or moralist should tread
This moss-grown alley, musing slow;
They seek, like me, the secret shade,
But not, like me, to nourish woe.

Me fruitful scenes and prospects waste
Alike admonish not to roam:
These tell me of enjoyments past,
And those of sorrows yet to come.

§ 220. Mutual Forbearance necessary to the Happiness of the Married State. COWPER.

THE Lady thus address'd her spouse—
What a mere dungeon is this house!
By no means large enough; and, was it,
Yet this dull room, and that dark closet,
Those hangings with their worn-out Graces,
Long beards, long noses, and pale faces,
Are such an antiquated scene,
They overwhelm me with the spleen.
Sir Humphrey, shooting in the dark,
Makes answer quite beside the mark;
No doubt, my dear; I bade him come,
Engag'd myself to be at home,

And shall expect him at the door
Precisely when the clock strikes four.

You are so deaf, the lady cried,
(And rais'd her voice, and frown'd beside,)
You are so sadly deaf, my dear,
What shall I do to make you hear?

Dismiss poor Harry! he replies,
Some people are more nice than wise;
For one slight trespass all this stir!
What if he did ride whip and spur?
'Twas but a mile—your fav'rite horse
Will never look one hair the worse.—
Well, I protest, tis past all bearing!—
Child, I am rather hard of hearing!

Yes, truly—one must scream and bawl;
I tell you, you can't hear at all.
Then with a voice exceeding low,
No matter if you hear or no.

Alas! and is domestic strife,
That sorest ill of human life,
A plague so little to be fear'd,
As to be wantonly incurr'd;
To gratify a fretful passion,
On every trivial provocation?
The kindest and the happiest pair
Will find occasion to forbear,
And something ev'ry day they live
To pity, and perhaps forgive.
But if infirmities that fall
In common to the lot of all,
A blemish, or a sense impair'd,
Are crimes so little to be spar'd,
Then farewell all that must create
The comfort of the wedded state.
Instead of harmony, 'tis jar,
And tumult, and intestine war.
The love that cheers life's latest stage,
Proof against sickness and old age,
Preserv'd by virtue from declension,
Becomes not weary of attention;
But lives when that exterior grace
Which first inspir'd the flame, decays.
'Tis gentle, delicate, and kind,
To faults compassionate or blind,
And will with sympathy endure
Those evils it would gladly cure:
But angry, coarse, and harsh expression,
Shows Love to be a mere profession,
Proves that the heart is none of his,
Or soon expels him if it is.

§ 221. The Winter Nosegay. COWPER.

WHAT nature, alas! has denied
To the delicate growth of our isle,
Art has in a measure supplied,
And winter is deck'd with a smile.
See, Mary, what beauties I bring
From the shelter of that sunny shed,
Where the flow'rs have the charms of the spring,
Though abroad they are frozen and dead.
'Tis a bow'r of Arcadian sweets,
Where Flora is still in her prime,
A fortress to which she retreats
From the cruel assaults of the clime.

While earth wears a mantle of snow,
The pinks are as fresh and as gay
As the fairest and sweetest that blow
On the beautiful bosom of May.
See how they have safely surviv'd
The frowns of a sky so severe;
Such Mary's true love, that has liv'd
Through many a turbulent year.
The charms of the late-blowing rose
Seem grac'd with a livelier hue,
And the winter of sorrow best shows
The truth of a friend such as you.

§ 222. Boadicea, an Ode. COWPER.

WHEN the British warrior queen,
Bleeding from the Roman rods,
Sought, with an indignant mien,
Counsel of her country's gods;
Sage, beneath a spreading oak,
Sat the Druid, hoary chief,
Ev'ry burning word he spoke
Full of rage, and full of grief:
Princess! if our aged eyes
Weep upon thy matchless wrongs,
'Tis because resentment ties
All the terrors of our tongues.
Rome shall perish—write that word
In the blood that she has spilt;
Perish hopeless and abhorr'd,
Deep in ruin as in guilt.
Rome, for empire far renown'd
Tramples on a thousand states,
Soon her pride shall kiss the ground—
Hark! the Gaul is at her gates.
Other Romans shall arise,
Heedless of a soldier's name;
Sounds, not arms, shall win the prize,
Harmony the path to fame.
Then the progeny that springs
From the forests of our land,
Arm'd with thunder, clad with wings,
Shall a wider world command.
Regions Cæsar never knew
Thy posterity shall sway,
Where his eagles never flew,
None invincible as they.
Such the bard's prophetic words,
Pregnant with celestial fire,
Bending as he swept the chords
Of his sweet but awful lyre.
She, with all a monarch's pride,
Felt them in her bosom glow,
Rush'd to battle, fought and died,
Dying hurl'd them at the foe.
Ruffians, pitiless as proud,
Heaven awards the vengeance due;
Empire is on us bestow'd,
Shame and ruin wait for you.

§ 223. Heroism. COWPER.

THERE was a time when Ætna's silent fire
Slept unperceiv'd, the mountain yet entire;
When, conscious of no danger from below,
She tower'd a cloud-capt pyramid of snow;
No thunders shook with deep intestine sound
The blooming groves that girdled her around;

“ He be de bestest poet, look !

“ Dat all the world must please ;

“ Vor he heb vrite von book,

“ So big as all this cheese !”

If at a distance you would paint a pig,

Let not the caxon a distinctness lack ;

Else all the lady critics will so stare,

And angry vow, “ ’Tis not a bit like hair !”

Be smooth as glass—like Denner, finish high ;

Then every tongue commends—

For people judge not only by the eye,

But feel your merit by their finger ends !

Make out each single bristle on his back.

Or if your meaner subject be a wig,

Nay, closely nosing, o’er the picture dwell,

As if to try the goodness by the smell.

Claude’s distances are too confus’d—

One floating scene—nothing made out—

For which he ought to be abus’d,

Whose works have been so cried about.

Give me the pencil, whose amazing style

Makes a bird’s beak appear at twenty mile ;

And to my view, eyes, legs, and claws will

With every feather of his tail and wing. [bring,

Make all your trees alike, for Nature’s wild—

Fond of variety—a wayward child— [sume ;

To blame your taste some blockheads may pre-

But mind, that ev’ry one be like a broom.

Of steel and purest silver form your waters,

And make your clouds like rocks and alligators. [willing

Whene’er you paint the moon, if you are
To gain applause—why, paint her like a shilling ;

Or Sol’s bright orb—be sure to make him glow
Precisely like a guinea or a jo*.

In short, to get your pictures prais’d and sold,

Convert, like Midas, ev’ry thing to gold.

I see, at excellence you’ll come at last—

Your clouds are made of very brilliant stuff ;

The blues on china mugs are now surpass’d,

Your sun-sets yields not to brick-walls nor buff.

In stumps of trees your art so finely thrives,

They really look like golden-hafted knives !

Go on, my lads, leave Nature’s dismal hue,

And she ere long will come and copy you.

§ 225. The Crooked Sixpence. BRAMSTON†.

—Sing, Maiden Muse,

Sixpence, Hoop-petticoat, and Church on fire.

HAPPY the maid, who, from green sickness free,

In canvass or in Holland pocket bears

A crooked Sixpence. She envieth not

New-married folks, nor sighs at others’ banns.

At eve, when Sol this hemisphere forsakes,

She to her needle or her wheel repairs :

Then, not unmindful of the man, dear man,

Whose faith, by promises and am’rous oaths,

And crooked Sixpence, was to her betroth’d,

William or Thomas ; at her work she cries,

His year next March is up, and so is mine.

Meanwhile he shoes, japans, or buckling wigs,

Sings Durfey’s songs by Purcellini set.

But I, who in my head bear pain, and draw

Short breath, attendant sure on sickness green,

With cinders, or with mortar from the wall,

Wretched repast ! my fading flesh distain !

In chimney corner close I poking sit,

Nor ever stir spontaneous, scarce when call’d.

I loll, I stretch, I yawn, and from a tub

(Like that whence Burgess preach’d) oatmeal purloin,

Oatmeal, unsalutary food if raw !

More wholesome than yclep’d burgout, which feeds

North-British lad, full famous in records

Of England’s chronicle for selling kings,

When he o’er hoary hills, or craggy cliffs,

Or rugged rocks, where eagles build their nest,

Rides on a galloway, though small, yet strong,

Voy’ging from Dungbay Head through sheriffdoms

Barren and bleak, with chequer’d plaid superb,

Intent with clipp’d Jacobuses to buy

French wine in Lusitanian casks ypent,

Which well-paid perjurers vouch all for port,

Though they perhaps the growth of Bourdeaux
be,

Chatteau, Margout, or the renown’d Pontack.

Thus while in qualms my heavy moments

creep,

A wight, in habit velvet all and gold,

Formal and fine, dread monster ! doctor hight,

With solemn face into the kitchen stalks,

His bony fingers thrice my pulse assay ;

Thrice secrets deep he asks ; surprised, I dread

The voice obscene, and hate the sickly sound,

What shall I do ? Amaz’d, confounded, dumb

I stand, nor answer give to his demands,

Nauseous to virgin ears ; my frizzled hair

Stands upright, to its roof my tongue sticks dry,

Retentive faculty my bowels lose,

So horrible he seems.—His horse-hair wig

Stiffen’d with angry curls, his agate cane

And gilded sword (too oft by cowards worn)

Disastrous deeds forbode ; in his right-hand

The desperate pen he takes, which, tinged with ink,

Strange characters and figures dire inscribes,

Illegible to maid, or man, or witch.

Oh, may such plagues averted ever be

From modest spinsters ! Lo ! behind him sneaks

Another mortal, not unlike himself,

Of jargon full, with terms obscure o’ercharg’d,

Apothecary call’d, whose foetid hands

With power mechanic, and with charms arcane,

Apollo, god of medicine, has endued.

If he gilt pills, powder, or bolus brown,

Haply into the open mouth convey

Of patient ; straight his body to the dose

Obsequious (as erst La Mancha’s knight)

Is to a feather bed well-warm’d convey’d :

Sheets never to be chang’d, and watchful nurse

The captive wretch incarcerate, till Time,

The best physician, set the patient free.

Beware, ye virgins, of your health beware ;

Be circumspect to romp or run ; ascend

The mountain’s airy top ; the empiric crew

Will else oft visit your abode, by fees

Of gold allur’d, and dangerous symptoms find ;

* A Portuguese Johannes.

† Author of the Man of Taste, the Art of Politics, &c.

Prompt to torment some pale unthriving wench
 With griping buckthorn, or with lancet sharp
 To pierce the shivering arm. So, poets sing,
 Sow-gelder erst, to calves, pigs, colts, and lambs
 Sworn everlasting foe, with goggling eyes
 To stables, sties, or cow-pens, early comes Protending his fell knife, to thoughtless bulls
 Sure ruin. So, in undiscerning night,
 Myriads of fairies, by their monarch led,
 To infants' cradles, or to nursery rooms,
 In serried files march on. Meanwhile the babe,
 Secure in innocence, sleeps sound and smiles.
 The peers and peeresses, with Oberon's self,
 Great Oberon, of fairy realms supreme,
 Within one circle all, in dance and song,
 And midnight music, move their tiny feet.
 Nurse hears, or thinks she hears, 'twixt sleep and wake,

Loud sounds, unseen, delightful to the ear :
 But fairy fiddles lull again to sleep.
 Eftsoons king Oberon and twelve chosen men,
 With scaling ladders of Dutch thread compact,
 The cradle mount, collecting all their might :
 The burthen of the ponderous child they raise,
 Inexorable ; nor will aught avail, [well :
 Bright eyes, loud tears, or limbs proportion'd
 For pigmy brat they change the bouncing boy,
 And to their own abodes, where'er they be,
 The harmless babe with Io Pæans drag.

So pass my days. But when a wake or fair
 Comes on, and calls the joyous damsels forth ;
 When swains, in leathern galligaskins clad,
 Treat nymphs with cider, sparkling drink, and
 In melancholy hall or kitchen wide, [sweet ;
 I cough deserted ; partner for the dance
 None chooses me ; none on the beechen bark
 My name inscribes ; no brawny bachelor
 Hangs over me enamour'd. Singly sad,
 My woe through three times six revolving years
 I count ; no jolly Joe, nor sober Sam,
 The matrimonial question e'er propos'd,
 Or crooked Sixpence offer'd to divide.
 Amidst the horrors of long wintry nights
 I sigh, my heart into my white-rann'd shoes
 With palpitation sinks. I ponder now
 Where rats-bane's sold, and now again the well
 I view irresolute, and oft the strength
 Of my own garters try. Peevish I pine,
 And fret, and rave, and wish ; my roving mind
 Finds no relief, my rolling eyes no sleep.

But, if the stranger Morpheus does invade

My painful limbs, my fancy, still awake,
 Thoughtful of man, and eager, in a dream,
 Imaginary blisses gives and takes
 In vain ! Awake, I find myself alone,
 Unbless'd, alas ! and curse the backward sex.
 Thus do I live, from pleasure quite cut off.
 Fairing to me no generous carter brings,
 No pears, no gingerbread, though brown, yet
 sweet ;

No filberts I, nor walnuts crack, nor squeeze
 The china orange through its tawny coat :
 Troubles immense, though mightier still remain.

My whale-bone hoop, that has so long withstood
 Pails, pots, and doors, and with circumference
 wide

My virtuous limbs enclos'd, by frequent sparks
 Of fire's destroy'd (what will not fire destroy !).
 The splinter'd ribs crack, break, and pierce
 amain

My wounded skin. In rags the canvass hangs ;
 The seven-fold circlets of the fluttering hoop,
 Uplifted, yield to every blast of wind,
 Southern, or Western, or the bleak North-east,
 North-east, that sinks the hearts of hippish souls ;

Till whale-bone, twitcher, petticoat, and all,
 Descend with clangor to the rattling hearth.
 So when of some great church the cupola,
 Or minster of renown'd metropolis,
 York, Canterbury, or the height of Paul's,
 Resisting long the jaws of ravenous Time,
 The summer's thunder, and the winter's wind,
 Fam'd many centuries for its stately strength,
 Upon some fatal, unexpected day,
 Smit by the rapid lightning's forked gleam,
 Admits the flame : the melted lead runs down :
 Their own destruction sapless beams increase :
 The neighbours with astonishment are seiz'd ;
 They stare, they scream, they help, they steal,
 they run,

Endeavours vain ! Unconquer'd, unextinct,
 Flames domineer aloft : far off resounds
 The wreck of chancels, and the crush of aisles ;
 High turrets hasten to the vaults below,
 And proud cathedrals tumble to the ground.

§ 226. The Copper Farthing. PENNINGTON*.

HAPPY the boy, who dwells remote from school,
 Whose pocket, or whose rattling box, contains

* This lady died in the year 1759, aged 25. The following character of her, by Mr. Duncombe, is extracted from that gentleman's Poem, called "The Femininead," vol. iv. Pearch's Collection of Poems, p. 184.

"Nor shall thy much-lov'd Pennington remain
 Unsung, unhonor'd in my votive strain.
 See where the soft enchantress, wandering o'er
 The fairy ground that Philips trod before,
 Exalts her chemic wand, and swift behold
 The basest metal ripen into gold !
 Beneath her magic touch, with wondering eye,
 We view vile copper with pure sterling vie ;
 Nor shall the Farthing, sung by her, forbear
 To claim the praises of the smiling Fair ;
 Till chuck and marble shall no more employ
 The thoughtless leisure of the truant boy."

A copper Farthing! He nor grieving hears Hot cheese-cakes cried, nor savoury mutton-pies;
 But with his play-mates, in the dusk of eve,
 To well-known blacksmith's shop, or churchyard, hies;
 Where, mindful of the sport that joys his heart,
 Marbles, or chuck, he instantly begins,
 With undissembled pleasure in his face,
 To draw the circle, or to pitch the dump:
 While I, confin'd within the hated walls
 Of school, resounding with a clamorous din,
 By still more hated books environ'd, I,
 With tedious lessons, and long task to get,
 My dismal thoughts employ: or wield my pen
 To mark dire characters on paper white:
 Not blunter pen or stronger character
 Uses the sage, a chiromancer hight,
 Sprung from Egyptian king, and swarthy race,
 Amenophis, or Ptolemy, when he,
 In search of stolen calf, or money lost,
 For wondering ploughman does his art employ;
 Or for the wish'd return of sweet-heart dear,
 Or apron fine, purloin'd from hawthorn-hedge,
 For country-maid consults directing stars,
 Gemini, Taurus, or chill Capricorn.

Thus while my lingering hours I joyless spend,
 With magisterial look, and solemn step,
 Appears my schoolmaster, tremendous wight!
 Dreaded by truant boys; how can I 'scape
 Th' expected punishment for task ungot?
 Aghast I stand, nor fly to covert bench,
 Or corner dark, to hide my hapless head;
 So great my terror, that it quite bereaves
 My limbs the power to fly. Slow he ascends
 Th' appointed seat, and on his right hand lies
 The bushy rod, compos'd of numerous twigs
 Torn from the birchen tree, or bending willow;
 Which to the flesh of idle boys portends,
 For the neglected task, a poignant smart;
 And with him comes another mighty elf,
 Yclep'd an usher; ah! terrific name
 To lesser wights! who if they hapless place
 In station wrong pronoun or participle,
 Straight, by the magic of his voice, are rais'd
 In attitude above their lov'd compeers,
 Where they, reluctant, various torments bear;
 Till by their dolorous complaints, that pierce the
 skies,
 They draw kind Pity, moist-ey'd goddess, down,
 To heal, with balm of sympathy, their woe.
 Ye urchins, take, ah! take peculiar care,
 For when ye wot not, much he marks your ways,
 And in his mind revolves disastrous deeds
 Against th' unwary wretch. So story tells,
 That chanticler, on dunghill's top elate,
 With haughty step, and watchful eye askance,
 Each tiny prominence he views, where hapless he
 May find conceal'd delicious grub or worm,
 To which his maw insatiate forebodes
 Certain destruction, while, behind or bush,
 Or pale encompassing the farmer's yard,
 Skulks Reynard, fraught with many a crafty wile

T' ensnare the feather'd race, who, if they stray
 Beyond the precincts of their mother's ken,
 He straight purloins them from her careful wing,
 With his sharp teeth torments their tender frame,
 And with the crimson gore distains their sides,
 Relentless; nor can all the piercing cries
 Of duckling, chick, or turkey, yet unfledg'd,
 His heart obdurate move; instant he tears
 Each trembling limb, devours the quivering
 flesh,

Nor leaves a remnant of the bloody feast,
 Save a few fluttering feathers scatter'd round
 (That with their varied plumage whilom deck'd
 The slaughter'd prey) to tell the hapless tale.

Thus joyless do I spend those hours the sun
 Illuminates; and when the silver moon
 Her gentle ray dispenses, and invites
 The swains and maids to mix in jovial dance
 Around the towering may-poles of the green,
 Where each gay ploughman does his partner choose

As love or fate directs; or o'er the lawn
 The needle thread, or toss the bounding ball;
 All cheerless I, nor dance, nor pleasing sport,
 Nor social mirth, nor bowl of nappy ale,
 Partake: but on her drooping raven wing,
 Sad Melancholy hovers o'er my head,
 Pale Envy rankles deep within my breast,
 And baneful venom sheds. Grim Horror too
 Attends my thoughts, and fills my gloomy mind
 With tales of gliding sprites, in milk-white shrouds

Array'd, and rattling chains, and yelling ghosts
 Irascible! or Fancy, mimic queen,
 To swift imagination's eye presents
 A group of tiny elves, in circling dance
 Of luscious feast employ'd; such elves as danc'd
 When Oberon did fair Titania wed;
 While I, in wishes impotent and vain,
 For Liberty, dear object of my hopes,
 The tedious moments spend; or if perchance,
 Morpheus invok'd, my heavy eye-lids close,
 Dear Liberty still haunts my sleeping thoughts,
 And in a short-liv'd dream those joys I taste,
 Which, waking, are denied; and beat the hoop

With dexterous hand, or run with feet as swift
 As feather'd arrow flies from archer's bow:
 Till, from my slumber wak'd, too soon I find
 It was illusion all, and mockery vain.

Thus, comfortless, appall'd, forlorn I pass
 The tardy hours, nor of those viands taste,
 Which are on other boys full oft bestow'd
 In plenteous manner by the liberal hand
 Of friend indulgent; apple-pie, or tart,
 Or trembling custard of delicious goût,
 Or frothy syllabub in copious bowl.
 Hard fate for me! Yet harder still betides
 Me, hapless youth! My faithful top, that oft
 Has cheer'd my drooping spirits, and reviv'd
 My saddening thoughts, when o'er the pavement smooth

It spins, and sleeps, and to its master's hand
 Does ample justice, now, alas! become
 To all the rude inclemencies of weather,

To time and destiny's relentless doom
 A miserable victim, quite decay'd
 With many services, and cleft throughout,
 All useless lies: ah! sight of saddest woe
 To wretched me! of ev'ry hope bereft,
 Of every gleam of comfort. So the wretch,
 Who near or Ætna or Vesuvius dwells,
 Beholds the sulph'rous flames, the molten rocks,
 And feels the ground trembling beneath his feet;

Till with a horrid yawn it opens wide
 Before his eyes, all glaring with affright;
 Swallows his cultur'd vines, his gardens, house,
 With all his soul held dear, his lovely wife,
 And prattling babes, the hopes of years to come;
 All, all are lost, in ruin terrible!

§ 227. The School-Boy. By the Rev. Mr. Maurice, Author of the Indian Antiquities. Written by him at a very early Age.

Multa tulit, fecitque puer. HOR.

THrice happy he, whose hours the cheering
 smiles
 Of freedom bless; who wantons uncontroll'd
 Where Ease invites, or Pleasure's syren voice:
 Him the stern tyrant with his iron scourge
 Annoys not, nor the dire oppressive weight
 Of galling chain: but when the blushing morn
 Purples the east, with eager transport wild,
 O'er hill, o'er valley, on his panting steed
 He bounds exulting, as in full career
 With horns, and hounds, and thund'ring shouts
 he drives

The flying stag; or when the dusky shades
 Of eve, advancing, veil the darken'd sky,
 To neighb'ring tavern, blithsome, he resorts
 With boon companion, where they drown their cares

In sprightly bumpers, and the mantling bowl.
 Far otherwise within these darksome walls,
 Whose gates, with rows of triple steel secur'd,
 And many a bolt, prohibit all egress,
 I spend my joyless days; ere dawn appears,
 Rous'd from my peaceful slumbers by the sound

Of awe-inspiring bell, whose every stroke
 Chills my heart-blood, all trembling, I descend
 From dreary garret, round whose ancient roof,
 Gaping with hideous chinks, the whistling blast
 Perpetual raves, and fierce descending rains
 Discharge their fury—dire lethargic dews
 Oppress my drowsy sense; still fancy teems
 With fond ideal joys, and, fir'd with what
 Or poets sing, or fable tale records,
 Presents transporting visions, goblets crown'd
 With juice of nectar, or the food divine
 Of rich ambrosia, tempting to the sight!
 While in the shade of some embowering grove,
 I lie reclin'd, or through Elysian plains
 Enraptur'd stray; where every plant and flow'r
 Send forth an odorous smell, and all the air
 With songs of love and melody resounds.
 Meanwhile benumbing cold invades my joints,
 To where, of antique mould, a lofty dome

As with slow faltering footsteps I resort,
 Rears its tremendous front; here all at once
 From thousand different tongues a mighty hum
 Assaults my ear; loud as the distant roar
 Of tumbling torrents; or as in some mart
 Of public note, for traffic far renown'd,
 Where Jew with Grecian, Turk with African,
 Assembled, in one general peal unite
 Of dreadful jargon.—Straight on wooden bench
 I take my seat, and con with studious care
 Th'appointed tasks; o'er many a puzzling page
 Poring intent, and sage Athenian bard,
 With dialect, and mood, and tense perplex'd;
 And conjugations varied without end.

When lo! with haughty stride (in size like him

Who erst, extended on the burning lake,
 "Lay floating many a rood") his sullen brow
 With low'ring frowns and fearful glooms o'ercast,

Enters the Pedagogue! terrific sight;
 An ample ninefold peruke, spread immense,
 Luxuriant waving, down his shoulders plays;
 His right hand fiercely grasps an oaken staff;
 His left a bunch of limber twigs sustains,
 Call'd by the vulgar birch, Tartarean root,
 Whose rankling points, in blackest poison dipt,
 Inflict a mortal pain; and, where they light,
 A ghastly furrow leave.—A sullen pause ensues:

As when, of old, the monarch of the floods,
 'Midst raging hurricanes and battling waves,
 Shaking the dreadful trident, rear'd aloft
 His awful brow, sudden the furious winds
 Were hush'd in peace, the billows ceas'd their rage:

Or when (if mighty themes like these allow
 An humble metaphor) the sportive race
 Of nibbling heroes, bent on wanton play,
 Beneath the shelter of some well-stor'd barn,
 In many an airy circle wheel around;
 Some eye, perchance, in private nook conceal'd,
 Beholds Grimalkin; instant they disperse
 In headlong flight, each to his secret cell,
 If haply he may 'scape impending fate.

Thus ceas'd the general clamor; all remain
 In silent terror wrapt, and thought profound.

Meanwhile, the Pedagogue throughout the dome

His fiery eye-balls, like two blazing stars,
 Portentous rolls, on some unthinking wretch
 To shed their baleful influence; whilst his voice,

Like thunder, or the cannon's sudden burst,
 Three times is heard, and thrice the roofs re-
 sound!

A sudden paleness gathers in my face;
 Through all my limbs a stiffening horror spreads,
 Cold as the dews of death; nor heed my eyes
 Their wonted function, but in stupid gaze
 Ken the fell monster; from my trembling
 hands

The time-worn volume drops; oh, dire presage
 Of instant woe! for now the mighty sound,
 Pregnant with dismal tidings, once again
 Strikes my astonish'd ears: transfix'd with awe,

And senseless for a time, I stand ; but soon,
By friendly jog or neighbouring whisper rous'd,
Obey the dire injunction ; straight I loose
Depending brogues, and mount the lofty throne
Indignant, or the back oblique ascend
Of sorrowful compeer : nor long delays
The monarch, from his palace stalking down,
With visage all inflam'd ; his sable robe
Sweeping in lengthening folds along the ground :
He shakes his sceptre, and th' impending scourge

Brandishes high ; nor tears nor shrieks avail ;
But with impetuous fury it descends,
Imprinting horrid wounds with fatal flow
Of blood attended, and convulsive pangs.

Curs'd be the wretch, for ever doom'd to bear
Infernal whippings ; he, whose savage hands
First grasp'd these barbarous weapons, bitter
cause

Of foul disgrace and many a dolorous groan
To hapless school-boy !—Could it not suffice
I groan'd and toil'd beneath the merciless weight
By stern relentless tyranny impos'd ;
But scourges, too, and cudgels were reserv'd,
To goad my harrow'd sides : this wretched life
Loading with heavier ills ? a life expos'd
To all the woes of hunger, toil, distress ;
Cut off from every genial source of bliss ;
From every bland amusement, wont to soothe
The youthful breast ; except when father Time,
In joyful change, rolls round the festive hour,
That gives this meagre, pining figure back
To parent fondness, and its native roofs !
Fir'd with the thought, then, then, my towering soul

Rises superior to its load, and spurns
Its proud oppressors ; frantie with delight,
My fancy riots in successive scenes
Of bliss and pleasures : plans and schemes are laid

How blest the fleeting moments to improve,
Nor lose one portion of so rare a boon.

But soon, too soon, the glorious scenes are fled, [state

Scarce one short moon enjoy'd ; (oh ! transient
Of sublunary bliss !) by bitter change,

And other scenes succeeded. What fierce pangs Then racks my soul ! what ceaseless floods of grief

Rush down my cheeks, while strong convulsive throbs

Heave all my frame, and choke the power of speech !

Forlorn I sigh, nor heed the gentle voice
Of friend or stranger, who, with soothing words
And slender gift, would fain beguile my woes :
In vain, for what can aught avail to soothe
Such raging anguish ? Oft with sudden glance
Before my eyes in all its horror glares

That well-known form, and oft I seem to hear
The thundering scourge—ah me ! e'en now I
Its deadly venom, raging as the pangs [feel

That tore Alcides, when the burning vest
Prey'd on his wasted sides.—At length, return'd
Within these hated walls, again I mourn
A sullen prisoner, till the wish'd approach
Of joyous holiday or festive play

Releases me : ah ! freedom that must end
With thee, declining Sol ! All hail, ye sires
For sanctity renown'd, whose glorious names
In large conspicuous characters portray'd,
Adorn the annual chronologic page
Of Wing or Partridge ; oft, when sore oppress'd
With dire calamities, the glad return
Of your triumphant festivals hath cheer'd
My drooping soul. Nor be thy name forgot,
Illustrious GEORGE ! for much to thee I owe
Of heart-felt rapture, as with loyal zeal
Glowing, I pile the crackling bonfire high,
Or hurl the mountain rocket through the air,
Or fiery whizzing serpent : thus thy name
Shall still be honor'd, as through future years
The circling seasons roll their festive round.

Sometimes, by dire compulsive hunger press'd,
I spring the neighbouring fence, and scale the trunk

Of apple-tree ; or wide, o'er flowery lawns
By hedge or thicket, bend my hasty steps,
Intent, with secret ambush, to surprise
The straw-built nest and unsuspecting brood
Of thrush or bull-finch ; oft with watchful ken
Eyeing the backward lawns, lest hostile glance
Observe my footsteps, while each rustling leaf
Stirr'd by the gentle gale alarms my fears :
Then, parch'd beneath the burning heats of noon,

I plunge into the limpid stream that laves
The silent vale ; or, on its grassy banks,
Beneath some oak's majestic shade recline,
Envyng the vagrant fishes, as they pass,
Their boon of freedom, till the distant sound
Of tolling curfew warns me to depart.

Thus under tyrant pow'r I groan, oppress'd
With worse than slavery ; yet my free-born soul
Her native warmth forgets not, nor will brook
Menace, or taunt, from proud insulting peer :
But summons to the field the doughty foe
In single combat, 'midst th' impartial throng,
There to decide our fate ; oft too, inflam'd
With mutual rage, two rival armies meet
Of youthful warriors ; kindling at the sight,
My soul is fill'd with vast heroic thoughts,
Trusting in martial glory to surpass
Roman or Grecian chief : instant, with shouts,
The mingling squadrons join the horrid fray ;
No need of cannon, or the murderous steel,
Wide wasting nature : rage our arms supplies,
Fragments of rock are hurl'd, and showers of stones

Obscure the day ; nor less the brawny arm
Or knotted club avail ; high in the midst
Are seen the mighty chiefs, through hosts of foes
Mowing their way : and now with tenfold rage
The combat burns, full many a sanguine stream
Distains the field, and many a veteran brave
Lies prostrate ; loud triumphant shouts ascend
By turns from either host ; each claims the palm
Of glorious conquest ; nor till night's dun shades
Involve the sky, the doubtful conflict ends.

Thus, when rebellion shook the thrones of
heaven,

And all th' eternal powers in battle met,
High o'er the rest, with vast gigantic strides,
The godlike leaders on th' embattled plain

Came towering, breathing forth revenge and
Nor less terrific join'd the inferior hosts [fate:
Of angel warriors, when encountering hills
Tore the rent conclave; flashing with the blaze
Of fiery arms, and lightnings not of Jove;
All heaven resounded, and the astonish'd deep
Of chaos bellow'd with the monstrous roar.

§ 228. Written in a Lady's Ivory Table Book,
1699. SWIFT.

PERUSE my leaves through every part,
And think thou seest my owner's heart,
Scrawl'd o'er with trifles thus, and quite
As hard, as senseless, and as light;
Expos'd to every coxcomb's eyes,
But hid with caution from the wise.
Here you may read, "Dear charming saint!"
Beneath, "A new receipt for paint:"
Here, in beau-spelling, "Tru tel deth;"
There, in her own, "For an el breth:"
Here, "Lovely nymph, pronounce my doom!"
There, "A safe way to use perfume:"
Here, a page fill'd with billet-doux,
On t' other side, "Laid out for shoes."
"Madam, I die without your grace."
"Item, for half a yard of lace."

Who that had wit would place it here,
For every peeping fop to jeer?
In pow'r of spittle and a clout,
Whene'er he please to blot it out:
And then, to heighten the disgrace,
Clap his own nonsense in the place.
Whoe'er expects to hold his part
In such a book, and such a heart,
If he be wealthy, and a fool,
Is in all points the fittest tool;
Of whom it may be justly said,
He's a gold pencil tipp'd with lead.

§ 229. Mrs. Harris's Petition. 1699.

To their Excellencies the Lords Justices of Ireland*, the humble petition of Frances Harris, (Who must starve, and die a maid, if it mis-carries),
Humbly sheweth,
That I went to warm myself in Lady Betty's†
chamber, because I was cold;
And I had in a purse seven pounds four shillings and six-pence, besides farthings, in money and gold:
So, because I had been buying things for my Lady last night, [right.
I was resolv'd to tell my money to see if it was Now you must know, because my trunk has a very bad lock,
Therefore all the money I have, which, God knows, is a very small stock,

* The Earls of Berkeley and of Galway.

† Wife to one of the footmen.

§ The old deaf housekeeper.

** The Earl of Drogheda, who, with the Primate, was to succeed the two Earls.

†† Clerk of the kitchen.

‡‡ Ferris.

I keep in my pocket, tied about my middle, next to my smock.

So when I went to put up my purse, as God would have it, my smock was unripp'd,
And, instead of putting it into my pocket, down
it slipp'd!

Then the bell rung, and I went down to put my Lady to bed;

And, God knows, I thought my money was as safe as my maidenhead.

So, when I came up again, I found my pocket
feel very light:

But when I search'd, and miss'd my purse, Lord,
I thought I should have sunk outright.

Lord! madam, says Mary, how d'ye do? Indeed, says I, never worse:

But pray, Mary, can you tell what I have done with my purse?

Lord help me! said Mary, I never stirr'd out of this place.

Nay, said I, I had it in Lady Betty's chamber,
that's a plain case.

So Mary got me to bed, and cover'd me up warm;
However, she stole away my garters, that I might do myself no harm.

So I tumbled and toss'd all night, as you may very well think, [wink.

But hardly ever set my eyes together, or slept a
So I was a-dream'd, methought, that we went and search'd the folks round,

And in a corner of Mrs. Duke's‡ box, tied in a rag, the money was found.

So next morning we told Whittle, || and he fell
a-swearing:

Then my dame Wadgar§ came; and she, you know, is thick of hearing.

Dame, said I, as loud as I could bawl, do you know what a loss I have had?

Nay, said she, my Lord Colway's¶ folks are all very sad;

For my Lord Dromedary** comes o' Tuesday
without fail. [ail.

Pugh! said I, but that's not the business that I Says Cary††, says he, I have been a servant this five-and-twenty years come spring,

And in all the places I liv'd I never heard of such a thing.

Yes, says the‡‡ steward, I remember, when I was at my Lady Shrewsbury's,

Such a thing as this happen'd just about the time of gooseberries.

So I went to the party suspected, and I found her full of grief:

(Now you must know, of all things in the world, I hate a thief.)

However, I was resolv'd to bring the discourse slyly about:

Mrs. Dukes, said I, here's an ugly accident has happen'd out:

'Tis not that I value the money three skips of a louse ||||;

† Lady Betty Berkeley, afterwards Germaine.

|| The Earl of Berkeley's valet.

¶ Galway.

||| An usual saying of hers.

But the thing I stand upon is the credit of the house.

'Tis true, seven pounds, four shillings, and six-pence, makes a great hole in my wages : Besides, as they say, service is no inheritance in these ages.

Now, Mrs. Dukes, you know, and every body understands

That, though 'tis hard to judge, yet money can't go without hands.

The devil take me ! said she (blessing herself) if e'er I saw't.

So she roar'd like a bedlam, as though I had call'd her all to nought.

So you know, what could I say to her any more ? I e'en left her, and came away as wise as I was before.

Well ; but then they would have had me gone to the cunning man !

No, said I, 'tis the same thing, the chaplain will be here anon.

So the chaplain * came in : now the servants say he is my sweetheart,

Because he is always in my chamber, and I always take his part.

So, as the devil would have it, before I was aware, out I blunder'd,

Parson, said I, can you cast a nativity when a body's plunder'd ?

(Now you must know he hates to be call'd parson like the devil !)

Truly, says he, Mrs. Nab, it might become you to be more civil !

If your money be gone, as a learned divine says, d'ye see,

You are no text for my handling, so take that from me :

I was never taken for a conjurer before, I'd have you to know.

Lord, said I, don't be angry, I'm sure I never thought you so ;

You know I honor the cloth ; I design to be a parson's wife ;

I never took one in your coat for a conjurer in all my life.

With that he twisted his girdle at me like a rope, as who should say,

Now you may go hang yourself for me ! and so went away.

Well, I thought I should have swoon'd : Lord ! said I, what shall I do ?

I have lost my money, and shall lose my true-love too !

Then my Lord call'd me : Harry, † said my Lord, don't cry ;

I'll give something towards thy loss ; and, says my Lady, so will I.

O ! but, said I, what if, after all, the chaplain won't come to ?

For that he said (an't please your Excellencies) I must petition you.

The premises tenderly consider'd, I desire your Excellencies' protection,

And that I may have a share in next Sunday's collection ;

And, over and above, that I may have your Excellencies letter,

With an order for the chaplain aforesaid, or, instead of him, a better :

And then your poor petitioner, both night and day,

Or the chaplain (for 'tis his trade), as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

§ 230. A Description of the Morning. 1709.

Now hardly here and there a hackney-coach Appearing, show'd the ruddy morn's approach. Now Betty from her master's bed had flown, And softly stole to discompose her own.

The slipshod 'prentice from his master's door Had par'd the dirt, and sprinkled round the floor. Now Moll had whirl'd her mop with dext'rous Prepar'd to scrub the entry and the stairs. [airs, The youth with broomy stumps began to trace The kennel's edge, where wheels had worn the place. [deep,

The small-coal man was heard with cadence Till drown'd in shriller notes of chimney-sweep. Duns at his Lordship's gate began to meet, And brick-dust Moll had scream'd through half the street.

The turnkey now his flock returning sees, Duly let out a-nights to steal for fees. The watchful bailiffs take their silent stands, And school-boys lag with satchels in their hands.

§ 231. A Description of a City Shower. In Imitation of Virgil's Georgics. 1710.

CAREFUL observers may foretel the hour, By sure prognostics, when to dread a show'r. While rain depends, the pensive cat gives o'er Her frolics, and pursues her tail no more. Returning home at night, you'll find the sink Strike your offended sense with double stink. If you be wise, then go not far to dine ; You'll spend in coach-hire more than save in wine.

A coming show'r your shooting corns presage, Old aches will throb, your hollow tooth will rage ; Sauntering in coffee-house is Dulman seen ; He damns the climate, and complains of spleen.

Meanwhile the south, rising with dabbled wings,

A sable cloud athwart the welkin flings, That swill'd more liquor than it could contain, And, like a drunkard, gives it up again.

Brisk Susan whips her linen from the rope, While the first drizzling shower is borne aslope ; Such is that sprinkling which some careless quean

Flirts on you from her mop, but not so clean : You fly, invoke the gods ; then, turning, stop To rail ; she, singing, still whirls on her mop. Not yet the dust had shunn'd th' unequal strife, But, aided by the wind, sought still for life ; And, wafted with its foe by violent gust, 'Twas doubtful which was rain, and which was dust.

Ah ! where must needy poet seek for aid, When dust and rain at once his coat invade ?

* Dr. Swift.

† A cant word of Lord and Lady B. to Mrs. Harris.

Sole coat ! where dust cemented by the rain
 Erects the nap, and leaves a cloudy stain !
 Now in contiguous drops the flood comes down,
 Threatening with deluge this devoted town.
 To shops in crowds the daggled females fly
 Pretend to cheapen goods, but nothing buy.
 The Templar spruce, while every spout's abroach,
 Stays till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.
 The tuck'd-up sempstress walks with hasty
     strides,
 While streams run down her oil'd umbrella's sides.

Here various kinds, by various fortunes led,
 Commence acquaintance underneath a shed.
 Triumphant Tories and desponding Whigs
 Forget their feuds, and join to save their wigs.
 Box'd in a chair, the beau impatient sits,
 While spouts run clattering o'er the roof by fits,
 And ever and anon with frightful din
 The leather sounds, he trembles from within.
 So when Troy chairmen bore the wooden steed,
 Pregnant with Greeks impatient to be freed,
 (Those bully Greeks, who, as the moderns do,
 Instead of paying chairmen, ran them through,) Laocoon struck the outside with his spear,
 And each imprison'd hero quak'd for fear.

Now from all parts the swelling kennels flow,
 And bear their trophies with them as they go :
 Filth of all hues and odours seem to tell
 What street they sail'd from, by their sight and smell

They, as each torrent drives, with rapid force
 From Smithfield or St. Pulchre's shape their course ;

And, in huge confluence join'd at Snow-hill
     ridge,

Fall from the conduit prone to Holborn-bridge.
 Sweepings from butchers' stalls, dung, guts,
     and blood,

Drown'd puppies, stinking sprats, all drench'd
     in mud, [down the flood.

Dead cats, and turnip-tops, come tumbling

§ 232. On the little House by the Church-yard of Castlenock. 1710.

WHOEVER pleaseth to inquire
 Why yonder steeple wants a spire,
 The gray old fellow Poet Joe *
 The philosophic cause will show.
 Once on a time a western blast
 At least twelve inches overcast,
 Reckoning roof, weathercock, and all,
 Which came with a prodigious fall !
 And, tumbling topsy-turvy round,
 Lit with its bottom on the ground ;
 For, by the laws of gravitation,
 It fell into its proper station.

This is a little strutting pile
 You see just by the church-yard stile ;
 The walls in tumbling gave a knock,
 And thus the steeple got a shock ;

* Mr. Beaumont of Trim.

† Dr. Swift's curate at Laracor.

‡ Stella.

† Archdeacon Wall, a correspondent of Swift's.

§ Minister of Trim.

¶ The waiting-woman.

From whence the neighbouring farmer calls
 The steeple, Knock ; the vicar, Walls †.

The vicar once a week creeps in,
 Sits with his knee up to his chin ;
 Here cons his notes and takes a whet,
 Till the small ragged flock is met.

A traveller, who by did pass,
 Observ'd the roof behind the grass ;
 On tip-toe stood, and rear'd his snout,
 And saw the parson creeping out ;
 Was much surpris'd to see a crow
 Venture to build his nest so low.
 A school-boy ran unto 't and thought
 The crib was down, the blackbird caught.

A third, who lost his way by night,
 Was forc'd for safety to alight ;
 And, stepping o'er the fabric-roof,
 His horse had like to spoil his hoof.

Warburton ‡ took it in his noddle,
 This building was design'd a model
 Or of a pigeon-house or oven,
 To bake one loaf, and keep one dove in.

Then Mrs. Johnson || gave her verdict,
 And every one was pleas'd that heard it :
 " All that you make this stir about,
 Is but a still which wants a spout."

The Reverend Dr. Raymond § guess'd
 More probably than all the rest ;
 He said, but that it wanted room,
 It might have been a pigmy's tomb.

The doctor's family came by,
 And little miss began to cry :
 Give me that house in my own hand !
 Then madam bade the chariot stand ;
 Call'd to the clerk in manner mild,
 Pray, reach that thing here to the child :
 That thing, I mean, among the kale,
 And here's to buy a pot of ale.

The clerk said to her, in a heat,
 What ! sell my master's country-seat,
 Where he comes every week from town !
 He would not sell it for a crown.
 Poh ! fellow, keep not such a pother ;
 In half an hour thou 'lt make another.

Says Nancy ¶, I can make for miss
 A finer house ten times than this ;
 The Dean will give me willow-sticks,
 And Joe, my apron-full of bricks.

§ 233. The Fable of Midas. 1711.

MIDAS, we are in story told,
 Turn'd every thing he touch'd to gold.
 He chipp'd his bread, the pieces round
 Glitter'd like spangles on the ground :
 A codling, ere it went his lip in,
 Would straight become a golden pippin :
 He call'd for drink ; you saw him sup
 Potable gold in golden cup :
 His empty paunch that he might fill,
 He suck'd his victuals through a quill ;

Untouch'd it pass'd between his grinders,
Or 't had been happy for gold-finders :
He cock'd his hat, you would have said
Mambrino's helm adorn'd his head.
Whene'er he chanc'd his hands to lay
On magazines of corn or hay,
Gold ready-coin'd appear'd instead
Of paltry provender and bread ;
Hence by wise farmers we are told,
Old hay is equal to old gold ;
And hence a critic deep maintains,
We learn'd to weigh our gold by grains.

This fool had got a lucky hit,
And people fancied he had wit.
Two gods their skill in music tried,
And both chose Midas to decide :
He against Phœbus' harp decreed,
And gave it for Pan's oaten reed.
The god of wit, to show his grudge,
Clapp'd ass's ears upon the judge ;
A goodly pair, erect and wide,
Which he could neither gild nor hide.

And now the virtue of his hands
Was lost among Pactolus' sands,
Against whose torrent while he swims,
The golden scurf peels off his limbs :
Fame spreads the news, and people travel
From far to gather golden gravel ;
Midas, expos'd to all their jeers,
Had lost his art, and kept his ears.

This tale inclines the gentle reader
To think upon a certain leader ;
To whom from Midas down descends
That virtue in the fingers' ends.
What else by perquisites are meant,
By pensions, bribes, and three per cent.
By places and commissions sold,
And turning dung itself to gold ;
By starving in the midst of store,
As t' other Midas did before ?

None e'er did modern Midas choose
Subject or patron of his muse,
But found him thus their merit scan,
That Phœbus must give place to Pan :
He values not the poet's praise,
Nor will exchange his plums for bays :
To Pan alone rich misers call ;
And there's the jest, for Pan is all.
Here English wits will be to seek ;
Howe'er, 'tis all one in the Greek.

Besides, it plainly now appears
Our Midas too hath ass's ears ;
Where every fool his mouth applies,
And whispers-in a thousand lies ;
Such gross delusions could not pass
Through any ears but of an ass.

But gold defiles with frequent touch :
There's nothing fouls the hands so much :
And scholars give it for the cause
Of British Midas' dirty paws ;
Which while the senate strove to scour,
They wash'd away the chymic pow'r

While he his utmost strength applied,
To swim against this pop'lar tide,
The golden spoils flew off apace :
Here fell a pension, there a place :

The torrent merciless imbibes
Commissions, perquisites, and bribes,
By their own weight sunk to the bottom ;
Much good may do them that have caught 'em !
And Midas now neglected stands,
With ass's ears and dirty hands.

§ 234. A Dialogue between a Member of Parliament and his Servant. In Imitation of Horace, Sat. II. vii. First printed in 1752.

Serv. LONG have I heard your fav'rite theme,
A general reformation scheme,
To keep the poor from every sin,
From gaming, murder, and from gin,
And now I have no less an itch
To venture to reform the rich.

Memb. What, John ! are you too turn'd projector ?

Come then, for once I'll hear your lecture.
For since a member, as 'tis said,
His projects to his servants read,
And of a favourite speech a book made
With which he tir'd each night a cook-maid,
And so it hapt that every morning
The tasteless creatures gave him warning ;
Since thus we use them, 'tis but reason
We hear our servants in their season.

Begin. Serv. Like gamblers, half mankind
Persist in constant vice combin'd ;
In races, routs, the stews, and White's,
Pass all their days and all their nights.

Others again like Lady Prue,
Who gives the morning church its due ;
At noon is painted, dress'd, and curl'd,
And one amongst the wicked world ;
Keeps her account exactly even,
As thus : " Prue creditor to heaven :
To sermons heard on extra days.

Debtor : To masquerade and plays.

Item : to Whitfield, half an hour.

Per contra : To the colonel, four."

Others, I say, pass half their time
In folly, idleness, or crime :
Then all at once their zeal grows warm,
And every throat resounds reform.

A lord his youth in every vice
Indulg'd, but chief in drabs and dice,
Till worn by age, disease, and gout,
Then nature modestly gave out.
Not so my Lord—who still, by proxy,
Play'd with his darling dice and doxy.

I laud this constant wretch's state,
And pity all who fluctuate ;
Prefer this slave to dear backgammon,
To those who serve both God and mammon ;
To those who take such pains to awe
The nation's vices by the law,
Yet, while they draw their bill so ample,
Neglect the influence of example.

Memb. To whom d'ye preach this senseless sermon ?

Serv. To you, good Sir. Memb. To me,
ye vermin ?

Serv. To you, who every day profess
T' admire the times of good Queen Bess,

But let your heart sincerer praise
Bestow on these or Charles's days :
You still approve some absent place—
(The present's ever in disgrace!)
And, such your special inconsistency,
Make the chief merit in the distance.

If e'er you miss a supper-card
(Though all the while you think it hard,)
You're all for solitude and quiet,
Good hours and vegetable diet,
Reflection, air, and elbow-room :
No prison like a crowded drum !
But, should you meet her Grace's summons
In full committee of the Commons,
Though well you know her crowded house
Will scarce contain another mouse,
You quit the business of the nation,
And brethren of the reformation ;
Though ——— begs you'll stay and vote,
And zealous ——— tears your coat,
You damn your coachman, storm and stare,
And tear your throat to call a chair.
Nay, never frown, and good-now hold
Your hand a while ; I've been so bold
To paint your follies ; now I'm in,
Let's have a word or two on sin.

Last night I heard a learned poult'rer
Lay down the law against th' adulterer ;
And let me tell you, Sir, that few
Hear better doctrine in a pew.
Well ! you may laugh at Robin Hood,
I wish your studies were as good.
From Mandeville you take your morals ;
Your faith from controversial quarrels ;
But ever lean to those who scribble
Their crudities against the Bible ;
Yet tell me I shall crack my brain
With hearing Henley * or Romaine.

Deserves that critic most rebuke
In judging on the Pentateuch,
Who deems it, with some wild fanatics,
The only school of mathematics ;
Or he, who, making grave profession
To lay aside all prepossession,
Calls it a bookseller's edition
Of maim'd records and vague tradition ?

You covet, Sir, your neighbour's goods ;
I take a piece at Peter Wood's † :
And when I've turn'd my back upon her,
Unwounded in my heart or honor,
I feel nor infamous, nor jealous
Of richer culls, or prettier fellows.
But you, the grave and sage reformer,
Must go by stealth to meet your charmer ;
Must change your star, and every note
Of honor, for a bear-skin coat :
That legislative head so wise
Must stoop to base and mean disguise.
Some Abigail must then receive you,
Brib'd by the husband to deceive you.

She spies Cornuto on the stairs ;
Wakes you ; then, melted by your prayers,
Yields, if with greater bribe you ask it,
To pack your worship in the basket.
Laid neck and heels, true Falstaff-fashion,
There form new schemes of reformation.

Thus 'scap'd the murd'ring husband's fury,
Or thumping fine of cuckold jury ;
Henceforth, in memory of your danger,
You'll live to all intrigues a stranger ?
No ; ere you've time for this reflection,
Some new debauch is in projection ;
And, for the next approaching night,
Contrivance for another fright.
This makes you, though so great, so grave,
(Nay ! wonder not) an abject slave ;
As much a slave as I ; nay, more :
I serve one master, you a score,
And, as your various passions rule,
By turns are twenty tyrants' fool.

Memb. Who then is free ? Serv. The wise
alone,

Who only bows to reason's throne ;
Whom neither want, nor death, nor chains,
Nor subtle persecutors' pains,
Nor honors, wealth, nor lust, can move
From virtue and his country's love.
Self-guarded like a globe of steel,
External insults can he feel,
Or e'er present one weaker part
To Fortune's most insidious dart ?
Much-honor'd master, may you find
These wholesome symptoms in your mind !
Can you be free while passions rule you ;
While women every moment fool you ;
While forty mad capricious whores
Invite, then turn you out of doors ;
Of every do it contrive to trick you,
Then bid their happier footman kick you ?

Convinc'd by every new disaster
You serve a new despotic master ;
Say, can your pride and folly see
Such difference 'twixt yourself and me ?

Shall you be struck with Titian's tints,
And mayn't I stop to stare at prints ?
Dispos'd along the extensive glass,
They catch and hold me ere I pass.
Where Slack is made to box with Broughton,

I see the very stage they fought on :
The bruisers live, and move, and bleed,
As if they fought in very deed.
Yet I'm a loiterer, to be sure ;
You a great judge and connoisseur !

Shall you prolong the midnight ball
With costly banquet at Vauxhall ;
And yet prohibit earlier suppers
At Kilbourn, Sadler's-wells, or Cuper's ‡ ?
Are these less innocent in fact,
Or only made so by the act ?

* The celebrated orator of Clare Market.

† This worthy a few years before fell under the displeasure of the mob, who broke into his house, near St. Clement's, and burnt all his furniture, which they threw into the street.

‡ Places of entertainment at that time. Two of them have been since shut up.

Those who contribute to the tax,
On tea, and chocolate, and wax *,
With high ragouts their blood inflame,
And nauseate what they eat for fame;
Of these the Houses take no knowledge,
But leave them fairly to the College.
O! ever prosper their endeavours
To aid your dropsies, gouts, and fevers!
Can it be deem'd a shame or sin
To pawn my livery for gin;
While bonds and mortgages at White's
Shall raise your fame with Arthur's knights?
Those worthies seem to see no shame in,
Nor strive to pass a slur on, gaming;
But rather to devise each session
Some law in honor o' the profession;
Lest sordid hands or vulgar place
The noble mystery should debase;
Lest ragged scoundrels, in an ale-house,
Should chalk their cheatings on the bellows;
Or boys the sacred rites profane
With orange-barrows in a lane.
Where lies the merit of your labors
To curb the follies of your neighbours;
Deter the gambler, and prevent his
Confederate arts to gull the 'prentice;
Unless you could yourself desist
From hazard, faro, brag, and whist;
Unless your philosophic mind
Can from within amusement find,
And give at once to use and pleasure
That truly precious time, your leisure?
In vain your busy thoughts prepare
Deceitful sepulchres of care:
The downy couch, the sparkling bowl,
And all that lulls or soothes the soul—

Memb. Where is my cane, my whip, my hanger?

I'll teach you to provoke my anger.

Serv. Heyday! my master's brain is crack'd,
Or else he's making some new act.

Memb. To set such rogues as you to work,
Perhaps, or send you to the Turk †.

§ 235. The Intruder. In Imitation of Horace,
Sat. I. ix. First printed in 1754.

A CERTAIN free, familiar spark,
Pertly accosts me in the Park:
" 'Tis lovely weather, sure! how gay
The sun!—I give you, Sir, good-day."
Your servant, Sir. To you the same—
But—give me leave to crave your name.
" My name? Why sure you've seen my face
About in every public place.
I'm known to almost all your friends
(No one e'er names you but commends)—
For some I plant; for some I build;
In every taste and fashion skill'd—

Were there the least regard for merit!—
The rich in purse are poor in spirit.
You know Sir Pagode (here, I'll give ye
A front I've drawn him for a privy)—
This winter, Sir, as I'm a sinner,
He has not ask'd me once to dinner."

Quite overpowered with this intrusion,
I stood in silence and confusion.

He took the advantage, and pursued:
" Perhaps, Sir, you may think me rude;
But sure I may suppose my talk
Will less disturb you while you walk.
And yet I now may spoil a thought,
But that's indeed a venial fault:—

I only mean to such, d'ye see,
Who write with ease, like you and me.

I write a sonnet in a minute:
Upon my soul, there's nothing in it.

But you to all your friends are partial:
You reckon *** another Martial—

He'd think a fortnight well bestow'd
To write an epigram or ode.

****'s no poet, to my knowledge;
I knew him very well at college:

I've writ more verses in an hour,
Than he could ever do in four.

You'll find me better worth your knowing—
But tell me, which way are you going?"

What various tumults swell'd my breast,
With passion, shame, disgust, oppress!

This courtship from my Brother Poet.
Sure no similitude can show it:

Not young Adonis when pursu'd
By amorous antiquated prude;

Nor Gulliver's distressful face,
When in the Yahoo's loath'd embrace.

In rage, confusion and dismay,
Not knowing what to do or say;

And having no resource but lying—
A friend at Lambeth lies a-dying—

" Lambeth!" (he re-assumes his talk)
" Across the bridge—the finest walk—

Don't you admire the Chinese bridges,
That wave in furrows and in ridges!

They've finish'd such a one at Hampton:
'Faith, 'twas a plan I never dreamt on—

The prettiest thing that e'er was seen—
'Tis printed in the Magazine."

This wild farrago who could bear?
Sometimes I run; then stop and stare:

Vex'd and tormented to the quick,
By turns grow choleric and sick;

And glare my eye, and show the white,
Like vicious horses when they bite.

Regardless of my eye or ear,
His jargon he renews.—" D'ye hear

Who 'twas compos'd the tailor's dance?
I practis'd fifteen months in France:

I wrote a play—'twas done in haste—
I know the present want of taste,

And dare not trust it on the town—
No tragedy will e'er go down;

* It was urged in the petitions of some of the houses of public entertainment, that the suppression of them might greatly diminish the duties on tea, chocolate, and wax-lights.

† Among the many projects for the punishment of rogues, it has been frequently proposed to send them in exchange for English slaves in Algiers.

The new burletta now's the thing—
 Pray did you ever hear me sing?"
Never indeed—"Next time we meet—
 We're just now coming to the street.—
 Bless me! I had almost forgot:
 There's poor Jack Stiles will go to pot.
 Sir Scrutiny has press'd me daily
 To be this hour at the Old Bailey,
 To witness to his good behaviour:
 My uncle's voter, under favor—
 Egad, I'm puzzled what to do,
 To save him will be losing you:
 Yet we must save him if we can,
 For he's a staunch one, a DEAD MAN*."
*By your account he's so indeed,
 Unless you make some better speed.
 This moment fly to save your friend—
 Or else prepare him for his end.*
 "Hang him, he's but a single vote;
 I wish the halter round his throat.
 To Lambeth I attend you, Sir."
*Upon my soul! you shall not stir.
 Preserve your voter from the gallows:
 Can human nature be so callous,
 So negligent when life's at stake?
 "I'd hang a hundred for your sake."
 I wish you'd do as much by me—
 Or any thing to set me free.*

Deaf to my words, he talks along,
 Still louder than the buzzing throng.

"Are you," he cries, "as well as ever
 With Lady Grace? she's vastly clever!"
*Her merit all the world declare:
 Few, very few, her friendship share.*

"If you'd contrive to introduce
 Your friend here, you might find an use—"

*Sir, in that house there's no such doing,
 And the attempt would be one's ruin.
 No art, no project, no designing,
 No rivalry, and no outshining.*

"Indeed! you make me long the more
 To get admittance. Is the door
 Kept by so rude, so hard a clown,
 As will not melt at half-a-crown?
 Can't I cajole the female tribe,
 And gain her woman with a bribe?
 Refus'd to-day, suck up my sorrow,
 And take my chance again to-morrow?
 Is there no shell-work to be seen,
 Or Chinese chair, or Indian screen;
 No cockatoo nor marmozet,
 Lap-dog, gold-fish, nor paroquet?
 No French embroidery on a quilt?
 And no bow-window to be built?
 Can't I contrive, at times, to meet
 My lady in the park or street?
 At opera, play, or morning prayer,
 To hand her to her coach or chair?"

But now his voice, though late so loud,
 Was lost in the contentious crowd
 Of fish-wives newly corporate,
 A colony from Billingsgate†.

That instant on the bridge I spied
 Lord Truewit coming from his ride.

*My Lord—Sir William (I began)
 Has given me power to state a plan,
 To settle every thing between you;
 And so—'tis lucky that I've seen you.
 This morning—"Hold," replies the peer,
 And tips me a malicious leer,
 "Against good-breeding to offend,
 And rudely take you from your FRIEND!"
 (His lordship, by the way, can spy
 How matters go, with half an eye;
 And loves in proper time and place,
 To laugh behind the gravest face.)
 "'Tis Saturday—I should not choose
 To break the Sabbath of the JEWS."
 The Jews, my lord!—"Why, sincethis pother,
 I own I'm grown a younger brother;
 Faith, persecution is no joke;
 I once was going to have spoke.—
 Bus'ness may stay till Monday night:
 "'Tis prudent, to be sure you're right."*

He went his way. I rav'd and fum'd:
To what ill fortune am I doom'd!
 But fortune had, it seems, decreed
 That moment for my being freed.
 Our talk, which had been somewhat loud,
 Insensibly the market-crowd
 Around my persecutor drew,
 And made them take him for a Jew.
 To me the caitiff now appeals;
 But I took fairly to my heels;
 And, pitiless of his condition,
 On brink of Thames and Inquisition,
 Left him to take his turn, and listen
 To each uncircumcis'd Philistine.

O Phœbus! happy he whose trust is
 In thee, and thy poetic justice!

§ 236: Horace, Book I. Ep. VII. Addressed to the Earl of Oxford. 1713.

HARLEY, the nation's great support,
 Returning home one day from court,
 (His mind with public cares possest,
 All Europe's business in his breast,)
 Observ'd a parson near Whitehall
 Cheap'ning old authors on a stall.
 The priest was pretty well in case,
 And show'd some humour in his face;
 Look'd with an easy, careless mien,
 A perfect stranger to the spleen;
 Of size that might a pulpit fill,
 But more inclining to sit still.
 My lord (who, if a man may say't, Loves mischief better than his meat)
 Was now dispos'd to crack a jest;
 And bid friend Lewis† go in quest—
 (This Lewis is a cunning shaver,
 And very much in Harley's favor)
 In quest who might this parson be,
 What was his name, of what degree;
 If possible, to learn his story,
 And whether he were Whig or Tory.

* A cant term for a sure vote.

† The fish-market at Westminster, just then opened.

‡ Erasmus Lewis, Esq. the treasurer's secretary.

Lewis his patron's humor knows,
 Away upon his errand goes,
 And quickly did the matter sift,
 Found out that it was Doctor Dwift;
 A clergyman of special note
 For shunning those of his own coat;
 Which made his brethren of the gown
 Take care at times to run him down:
 No libertine, nor over-nice,
 Addicted to no sort of vice,
 Went where he pleas'd, said what he thought,
 Not rich, but owed no man a groat;
 In state opinions à-la-mode,
 He hated Wharton like a toad;
 Had given the faction many a wound,
 And libell'd all the junto round;
 Kept company with men of wit,
 Who often father'd what he writ.
 His works were hawk'd in every street,
 But seldom rose above a sheet:
 Of late indeed the paper-stamp
 Did very much his genius cramp;
 And, since he could not spend his fire,
 He now intended to retire.

Said Harley, "I desire to know
 From his own mouth if this be so;
 Step to the Doctor straight, and say,
 I'd have him dine with me to-day."
 Swift seem'd to wonder what he meant,
 Nor would believe my lord had sent:
 So never offer'd once to stir;
 But coldly said, "Your servant, Sir!"
 "Does he refuse me?" Harley cried.
 "He does, with insolence and pride."

Some few days after, Harley spies
 The Doctor fasten'd by the eyes
 At Charing-cross among the rout,
 Where painted monsters are hung out:
 He pull'd the string, and stopp'd his coach,
 Beckoning the Doctor to approach.

Swift, who could neither fly nor hide,
 Came sneaking to the chariot-side,
 And offer'd many a lame excuse:
 He never meant the least abuse—
 "My lord—the honor you design'd—
 Extremely proud—but I had din'd.
 I'm sure I never should neglect—
 No man alive has more respect."
 "Well, I shall think of that no more
 If you'll be sure to come at four."

The Doctor now obeys the summons,
 Likes both his company and commons;
 Displays his talents, sits till ten;
 Next day invited, comes again;
 Soon grown domestic, seldom fails
 Either at morning or at meals:
 Came early, and departed late;
 In short the gudgeon took the bait.
 My lord would carry on the jest,
 And down to Windsor take his guest.
 Swift much admires the place and air,
 And longs to be a canon there;
 In summer round the park to ride,
 In winter never to reside.

"A canon! that's a place too mean;
 No, Doctor, you shall be a Dean;

Two dozen canons round your stall,
 And you the tyrant o'er them all:
 You need but cross the Irish seas,
 To live in plenty, pow'r, and ease."
 Poor Swift departs; and, what is worse,
 With borrow'd money in his purse;
 Travels at least a hundred leagues,
 And suffers numberless fatigues.

Suppose him now a Dean complete,
 Demurely lolling in his seat;
 The silver verge, with decent pride,
 Stuck underneath his cushion-side;
 Suppose him gone through all vexations,
 Patents, instalments, abjurations,
 First-fruits, and tenths, and chapter-treats;
 Dues, payments, fees, demands, and cheats—
 (The wicked laity's contriving,
 To hinder clergymen from thriving).
 Now, all the Doctor's money spent,
 His tenants wrong him in his rent;
 The farmers, spitefully combin'd,
 Force him to take his tithes in kind:
 And Parvisol* discounts arrears
 By bills for taxes and repairs.

Poor Swift, with all his losses vex'd,
 Not knowing where to turn him next,
 Above a thousand pounds in debt,
 Takes horse, and in a mighty fret,
 Rides day and night at such a rate,
 He soon arrives at Harley's gate;
 But was so dirty, pale, and thin,
 Old Read† would hardly let him in.

Said Harley, "Welcome, Reverend Dean!
 What makes your worship look so lean?
 Why, sure you won't appear in town
 In that old wig and rusty gown?
 I doubt your heart is set on pelf,
 So much that you neglect yourself.
 What! I suppose, now stocks are high,
 You've some good purchase in your eye?
 Or is your money out at use?"

"Truce, good my lord, I beg a truce,"
 The Doctor in a passion cried,
 "Your raillery is misapplied;
 Experience I have dearly bought;
 You know I am not worth a groat;
 But you resolv'd to have your jest,
 And 'twas a folly to contest.
 Then, since you now have done your worst,
 Pray leave me where you found me first.

§ 237. Horace, Book II. Sat. VI.

I've often wish'd that I had clear,
 For life, six hundred pounds a year,
 A handsome house to lodge a friend,
 A river at my garden's end,
 A terrace-walk, and half a rood
 Of land set out to plant a wood.

Well, now I have all this and more,
 I ask not to increase my store;

* The Dean's agent, a Frenchman.

† The Lord Treasurer's porter.

But here a grievance seems to lie,
All this is mine but till I die;
I can't but think 'twould sound more clever,
"To me and to my heirs for ever."

If I ne'er got or lost a groat,
By any trick or any fault;
And if I pray by reason's rules,
And not like forty other fools:
As thus: "Vouchsafe, O gracious Maker!
To grant me this and t'other acre:
Or, if it be thy will and pleasure,
Direct my plough to find a treasure!"
But only what my station fits,
And to be kept in my right wits,
Preserve, Almighty Providence!
Just what you gave me, competence:
And let me in these shades compose
Something in verse as true as prose;
Remov'd from all th' ambitious scene,
Nor puff'd by pride, nor sunk by spleen.

In short, I'm perfectly content,
Let me but live on this side Trent;
Nor cross the Channel twice a year,
To spend six months with statesmen here.

I must by all means come to town,
'Tis for the service of the crown.

"Lewis, the Dean will be of use;
Send for him up, take no excuse."
The toil, the danger of the seas—
Great ministers ne'er think of these;
Or let it cost five hundred pound,
No matter where the money's found;
It is but so much more in debt,
And that they ne'er consider'd yet.

"Good Mr. Dean; go change your gown;
Let my lord know you're come to town."

I hurry me in haste away,
Not thinking it is levee-day;
And find his Honor in a pound,
Hemm'd by a triple circle round,
Chequer'd with ribands blue and green:
How should I thrust myself between?
Some wag observes me thus perplex'd,
And, smiling, whispers to the next:
"I thought the Dean had been too proud
To jostle here among the crowd!"

Another, in a surly fit,
Tells me I have more zeal than wit:
"So eager to express your love,
You ne'er consider whom you shove,
But rudely press before a duke."
I own I'm pleased with this rebuke,
And take it kindly meant to show
What I desire the world should know.

I get a whisper, and withdraw;
When twenty fools I never saw
Come with petitions fairly penn'd,
Desiring I would stand their friend.

This humbly offers me his case;
That begs my interest for a place:
A hundred other men's affairs,
Like bees, are humming in my ears.
"To-morrow my appeal comes on:
Without your help the cause is gone."
"The duke expects my lord and you,
About some great affair, at two:

Put my Lord Bolingbroke in in mind
To get my warrant quickly sign'd:
Consider, 'tis my first request."
Be satisfied, I'll do my best.
Then presently he falls to tease:
"You may for certain if you please:
I doubt not, if his lordship knew—
And, Mr. Dean, one word from you—"
'Tis (let me see) three years and more (October next it will be four)
Since Harley bid me first attend,
And chose me for an humble friend;
Would take me in his coach to chat,
And question me of this and that: [wind?"
As, "What's o'clock?" and "How's the "Whose chariot's that we left behind?"

Or gravely try to read the lines
Writ underneath the country signs:
Or, "Have you nothing new to-day
From Pope, from Parnell, or from Gay?"
Such tattle often entertains
My lord and me as far as Staines,
As once a week we travel down
To Windsor and again to town,
Where all that passes inter nos
Might be proclaim'd at Charing-cross.

Yet some I know with envy swell,
Because they see me used so well.
"How think you of our friend the Dean?
I wonder what some people mean!
My lord and he are grown so great,
Always together, tête-à-tête:
What! they admire him for his jokes?
See but the fortune of some folks!"

There flies about a strange report
Of some express arriv'd at court.
I'm stopp'd by all the fools I meet,
And catechis'd in ev'ry street.
"You, Mr. Dean, frequent the great;
Inform us, will the emperor treat,
Or do the prints and papers lie?"
Faith, Sir, you know as much as I.
"Ah, Doctor, how you love to jest!"
'Tis now no secret.—I protest
'Tis one to me.—"Then tell us, pray,
When are the troops to have their pay?"
And though I solemnly declare
I know no more than my lord-mayor,
They stand amaz'd, and think me grown
The closest mortal ever known.

Thus, in a sea of folly tost,
My choicest hours of life are lost;
Yet always wishing to retreat,
O could I see my country-seat!
There, leaning near a gentle brook,
Sleep, or peruse some ancient book;
And there in sweet oblivion drown
Those cares that haunt the court and town!

§ 238. A true and faithful Inventory of the Goods belonging to Dr. Swift, Vicar of Laracor, upon lending his house to the Bishop of Meath till his Palace was rebuilt.

An oaken broken elbow-chair;
A caudle-cup without an ear;

A batter'd shatter'd ash bedstead;
 A box of deal, without a lid;
 A pair of tongs, but out of joint;
 A back-sword poker, without point;
 A pot that's crack'd across, around
 With an old knotted garter bound;
 An iron lock, without a key;
 A wig, with hanging quite grown grey;
 A curtain worn to half a stripe;
 A pair of bellows, without pipe;
 A dish which might good meat afford once;
 An Ovid, and an old Concordance;
 A bottle-bottom, wooden platter,
 One is for meal and one for water;
 There likewise is a copper skillet,
 Which runs as fast out as you fill it;
 A candlestick, snuff-dish, and save-all:
 And thus his household goods you have all.
 These to your Lordship, as a friend,
 Till you have built, I freely lend:
 They'll serve your Lordship for a shift;
 Why not, as well as Doctor Swift?

§ 239. An Elegy on the Death of Demar the Usurer, who died the 6th of July 1720.

Know all men by these presents, Death the tamer

By mortgage hath secur'd the corpse of Demar:
 Nor can four hundred thousand sterling pound
 Redeem him from his prison under ground.
 His heirs might well, of all his wealth possest,
 Bestow to bury him one iron chest.
 Plutus, the god of wealth, will joy to know
 His faithful steward's in the shades below.
 He walk'd the streets, and wore a threadbare cloak,
 He din'd and supp'd at charge of other folk;
 And by his looks, had he held out his palms,
 He might be thought an object fit for alms.
 So, to the poor if he refus'd his pelf,
 He us'd them full as kindly as himself.

Where'er he went he never saw his betters;
 Lords, knights, and squires, were all his humble
 debtors;

And under hand and seal the Irish nation
 Were forc'd to own to him their obligation.

He that could once have half a kingdom bought,

In half a minute is not worth a groat.
 His coffers from the coffin could not save,
 Nor all his interest keep him from the grave.
 A golden monument could not be right,
 Because we wish the earth upon him light.

O London tavern *! thou hast lost a friend,
 Though in thy walls he ne'er did farthing
 spend:

He touch'd the pence, when others touch'd the pot;

The hand that sign'd the mortgage paid the shot.

Old as he was, no vulgar known disease
 On him could ever boast a pow'r to seize;

“† But, as he weigh'd his gold, grim Death in spite
 Cast in his dart, which made three moulders
 light;
 And as he saw his darling money fail,
 Blew his last breath to sink the lighter scale.”
 He who so long was current, 'twould be strange
 If he should now be cried down since his change.

The Sexton shall green sods on thee bestow;
 Alas, the sexton is thy banker now!
 A dismal banker must that banker be,
 Who gives no bills but of mortality.

§ 240. Epitaph on a Miser.

BENEATH this verdant hillock lies
 Demar, the wealthy and the wise.
 His heirs, that he might safely rest,
 Have put his carcase in a chest;
 The very chest in which, they say,
 His other self, his money, lay.
 And if his heirs continue kind
 To that dear self he left behind,
 I dare believe that four in five
 Will think his better half alive.

§ 241. To Mrs. Houghton of Bormount, upon praising her Husband to Dr. Swift.

You always are making a god of your spouse,
 But this neither reason nor conscience allows:
 Perhaps you will say, 'tis in gratitude due,
 And you adore him because he adores you:
 Your argument's weak, and so you will find;
 For you, by this rule, must adore all mankind.

§ 242. Dr. Delany's Villa.

WOULD you that Delville I describe?
 Believe me, Sir, I will not jibe;
 For who would be satirical
 Upon a thing so very small?

You scarce upon the borders enter,
 Before you're at the very centre.
 A single crow can make it night,
 When o'er your farm she takes her flight:
 Yet, in this narrow compass, we

Observe a vast variety;
 Both walks, walls, meadows, and parterres,
 Windows, and doors, and rooms, and stairs,
 And hills, and dales, and woods, and fields,
 And hay, and grass, and corn, it yields;
 All to your haggard brought so cheap in,
 Without the mowing or the reaping:
 A razor, though to say't I'm loth,
 Would shave you and your meadows both.

* A tavern in Dublin where Demar kept his office.

† These four lines were written by Stella.

Though small's the farm, yet there's a house
Full large to entertain a mouse;
But where a rat is dreaded more
Than savage Calydonian boar;
For, if it's enter'd by a rat,
There is no room to bring a cat.

A little riv'let seems to steal
Down through a thing you call a vale,
Like tears adown a wrinkled cheek,
Like rain along a blade of leek;
And this you call your sweet Meander,
Which might be suck'd up by a gander,
Could he but force his nether bill
To scoop the channel of the rill:
For sure you'd make a mighty clutter,
Were it as big as city-gutter.

Next come I to your kitchen-garden,
Where one poor mouse would fare but hard in;
And round this garden is a walk,
No longer than a tailor's chalk.
Thus I compare what space is in it;
A snail creeps round it in a minute.
One lettuce makes a shift to squeeze
Up through a tuft you call your trees:
And, once a year, a single rose
Peeps from the bud, but never blows;
In vain then you expect its bloom!
It cannot blow, from want of room.

In short, in all your boasted seat,
There's nothing but yourself that's great.

§ 243. Mary the Cook-maid's Letter to Dr. Sheridan. 1723.

WELL, if ever I saw such another man since my mother bound my head!
You a gentleman! marry come up! I wonder where you were bred.
I'm sure such words do not become a man of your cloth:
I would not give such language to a dog, faith and troth.
Yes, you call'd my master a knave: fie, Mr.
Sheridan, 'tis a shame
For a parson, who should know better things,
to come out with such a name.
Knave in your teeth, Mr. Sheridan! 'tis both a shame and a sin;
And the Dean, my master, is an honestest man
than you and all your kin;
He has more goodness in his little finger than you have in your whole body;
My master is a personable man, and not a spindle-shank'd hoddy-doddy.
And now, whereby I find you would fain make an excuse,
Because my master one day, in anger, call'd
you goose;
Which, and I am sure I have been his servant
four years since October,
And he never call'd me worse than sweetheart,
drunk or sober:
Not that I know his reverence was ever con-
cern'd, to my knowledge,
Though you and your come-rogues keep him out so late in your college.

You say you will eat grass on his grave: a Christian eat grass!

Whereby you now confess yourself to be a goose or an ass:

But that's as much as to say, that my master should die before ye;

Well, well, that's as God pleases; and I don't believe that's a true story:

And so say I told you so, and you may go tell my master, what care I? [Mary.

And I don't care who knows it; 'tis all one to Every body knows that I love to tell truth, and shame the devil; [should be civil.

I am but a poor servant, but I think gentlefolks

Besides, you found fault with our victuals one day that you was here; [the year;

I remember it was on a Tuesday, of all days in
And Saunders the man says you are always jesting and mocking:

"Mary," said he one day as I was mending my master's stocking,

"My master is so fond of that minister that keeps the school— [makes him a fool."

I thought my master a wise man, but that man

"Saunders," said I, "I would rather than a quart of ale

He would come into our kitchen, and I would pin a dishelout to his tail."

And now I must go and get Saunders to direct
this letter;

For I write but a sad scrawl, but my sister
Marget she writes better.

Well, but I must run and make the bed, before my master comes from pray'rs:

And see now, it strikes ten, and I hear him
coming up stairs:

Whereof I could say more to your verses, if I could write written hand:

And so I remain, in a civil way, your servant
to command, MARY.

§ 244. Riddles, by Dr. Swift and his Friends.
Written in or about the Year 1724.

On a Pen.

In youth exalted high in air,
Or bathing in the waters fair,
Nature to form me took delight,
And clad my body all in white,
My person tall, and slender waist,
On either side with fringes grac'd;
Till me that tyrant man espied,
And dragg'd me from my mother's side.
No wonder now I look so thin;
The tyrant stripp'd me to the skin;
My skin he flay'd, my hair he cropp'd;
At head and foot my body lopp'd:
And then, with heart more hard than stone,
He pick'd my marrow from the bone.
To vex me more, he took a freak
To slit my tongue, and make me speak:
But that which wonderful appears;
I speak to eyes, and not to ears.
He oft employs me in disguise,
And makes me tell a thousand lies:
To me he chiefly gives in trust
To please his malice or his lust;

From me no secret he can hide,
I see his vanity and pride :
And my delight is to expose
His follies to his greatest foes.

All languages I can command,
Yet not a word I understand.
Without my aid, the best divine
In learning would not know a line ;
The lawyer must forget his pleading ;
The scholar could not show his reading.

Nay, man, my master, is my slave :
I give command to kill or save ;
Can grant ten thousand pounds a year,
And make a beggar's brat a peer.

But while I thus my life relate,
I only hasten on my fate.
My tongue is black, my mouth is furr'd,
I hardly now can force a word.
I die unpitied and forgot,
And on some dunghill left to rot.

§ 245. On Gold.

ALL-RULING tyrant of the earth,
To vilest slaves I owe my birth.
How is the greatest monarch blest,
When in my gaudy liv'ry drest !
No haughty nymph has pow'r to run
From me, or my embraces shun.
Stabb'd to the heart, condemn'd to flame,
My constancy is still the same.
The favourite messenger of Jove,
The Lemnian God, consulting strove
To make me glorious to the sight
Of mortals, and the gods' delight.
Soon would their altars' flame expire
If I refus'd to lend them fire.

§ 246. On a Corkscrew.

THOUGH I, alas ! a prisoner be,
My trade is, prisoners to set free.
No slave his lord's commands obeys
With such insinuating ways ;
My genius piercing, sharp, and bright,
Wherein the men of wit delight.
The clergy keep me for their ease,
And turn and wind me as they please.
A new and wondrous art I show
Of raising spirits from below ;
In scarlet some, and some in white :
They rise, walk round, yet never fright.
In at each mouth the spirits pass,
Distinctly seen as through a glass ;
O'er head and body make a rout,
And drive at last all secrets out :
And still the more I show my art,
The more they open ev'ry heart.

A greater chemist none than I,
Who from materials hard and dry
Have taught men to extract with skill
More precious juice than from a still.

Although I'm often out of case,
I'm not asham'd to show my face.
Though at the tables of the great
I near the sideboard take my seat ;

Yet the plain squire, when dinner's done,
Is never pleas'd till I make one :
He kindly bids me near him stand,
And often takes me by the hand.
I twice a day a hunting go,
Nor ever fail to seize my foe ;
And, when I have him by the pole,
I drag him upwards from his hole ;
Though some are of so stubborn kind,
I'm forc'd to leave a limb behind.
I hourly wait some fatal end ;
For I can break, but scorn to bend.

§ 247. On a Circle.

I'M up and down, and round about,
Yet all the world can't find me out.
Though hundreds have employ'd their leisure,
They never yet could find my measure.
I'm found almost in ev'ry garden,
Nay, in the compass of a farthing.
There's neither chariot, coach, nor mill,
Can move an inch, except I will.

§ 248. On Ink.

I AM jet-black, as you may see,
The son of Pitch and gloomy Night :
Yet all that know me will agree
I'm dead, except I live in light.
Sometimes in panegyric high,
Like lofty Pindar I can soar ;
And raise a virgin to the sky,
Or sink her to a pocky whore.
My blood this day is very sweet,
'To-morrow of a bitter juice ;
Like milk, 'tis cried about the street,
And so applied to different use.
Most wondrous is my magic pow'r,
For with one color I can paint ;
I'll make the devil a saint this hour,
Next make a devil of a saint.
'Through distant regions I can fly,
Provide me with but paper wings ;
And fairly show a reason why
There should be quarrels among kings.
And, after all, you'll think it odd,
When learned doctors will dispute,
That I should point the word of God,
And show where they can best confute.
Let lawyers bawl and strain their throats ;
'Tis I that must their lands convey,
And strip the clients to their coats ;
Nay, give their very souls away.

§ 249. On the Five Senses.

ALL of us in one you'll find,
Brethren of a wondrous kind ;
Yet among us all no brother
Knows one tittle of the other.
We in frequent councils are,
And our marks of things declare,

Where to us unknown a clerk
Sits and takes them in the dark.
He's the register of all
In our ken, both great and small;
By us forms his laws and rules;
He's our master, we his tools,
Yet we can, with greatest ease,
Turn and wind him where we please.

One of us alone can sleep,
Yet no watch the rest will keep;
But the moment that he closes,
Ev'ry brother else reposes.

If wine's bought, or victuals drest,
One enjoys them for the rest.

Pierce us all with wounding steel,
One for all of us will feel.

Though ten thousand cannons roar,
Add to them ten thousand more,
Yet but one of us is found
Who regards the dreadful sound.

Do what is not fit to tell,
There's but one of us can smell.

§ 250. On an Echo.

NEVER sleeping, still awake,
Pleasing most when most I speak:
'The delight of old and young,
Though I speak without a tongue:
Nought but one thing can confound me,
Many voices joining round me;
Then I fret and rave and gabble
Like the labourers of Babel.
Now I am a dog or cow,
I can bark, or I can low;
I can bleat, or I can sing
Like the warblers of the spring.
Let the love-sick bard complain,
And I mourn the cruel pain;
Let the happy swain rejoice,
And I join my helping voice;
Both are welcome, grief or joy,
I with either sport and toy.
Though a lady, I am stout,
Drums and trumpets bring me out;
Then I clash, and roar and rattle,
Join in all the din of battle.
Jove, with all his loudest thunder,
When I'm vex'd, can't keep me under;
Yet so tender is my ear,
That the lowest voice I fear.
Much I dread the courtier's fate,
When his merit's out of date;
For I hate a silent breath,
And a whisper is my death.

§ 251. On a Shadow in a Glass.

By something form'd, I nothing am,
Yet every thing that you can name;
In no place have I ever been,
Yet ev'ry where I may be seen;
In all things false, yet always true,
I'm still the same, but ever new.
Lifeless, life's perfect form I wear,
Can show a nose, eye, tongue, or ear,
Yet neither smell, see, taste, or hear.

All shapes and features I can boast,
No flesh, no bones, no blood—no ghost:
All colours, without paint, put on,
And change like theameleon.
Swiftly I come and enter there
Where not a chink lets in the air;
Like thought, I'm in a moment gone,
Nor can I ever be alone;
All things on earth I imitate
Faster than nature can create;
Sometimes imperial robes I wear,
Anon in beggar's rags appear;
A giant now, and straight an elf,
I'm ev'ry one, but ne'er myself;
Ne'er sad, I mourn; ne'er glad, rejoice;
I move my lips, but want a voice;
I ne'er was born, nor e'er can die:
Then pr'ythee tell me, what am I?

§ 252. On Time.

EVER eating, never cloying,
All devouring, all destroying;
Never finding full repast,
Till I eat the world at last.

§ 253. On the Vowels.

WE are little airy creatures,
All of diff'rent voice and features:
One of us in glass is set,
One of us you'll find in jet;
T' other you may see in tin,
And the fourth a box within;
If the fifth you should pursue,
It can never fly from you.

§ 254. On Snow.

FROM heaven I fall, tho' from earth I begin,
No lady alive can shew such a skin.
I'm bright as an angel, and light as a feather,
But heavy and dark when you squeeze me together.
Though candor and truth in my aspect I bear,
Yet many poor creatures I help to ensnare.
Though so much of heaven appears in my make,
The foulest impressions I easily take.
My parent and I produce one another;
The mother the daughter, the daughter the mother.

§ 255. On a Cannon.

BEGOTTEN, and born, and dying, with noise,
The terror of women, and pleasure of boys;
Like the fiction of poets concerning the wind,
I'm chiefly unruly when strongest confin'd.
For silver and gold I don't trouble my head,
But all I delight in is pieces of lead;

Except when I trade with a ship or a town,
Why then I make pieces of iron go down.
One property more I would have you remark,
No lady was ever more fond of a spark;
The moment I get one, my soul's all afire,
And I roar out my joy, and in transport expire.

§ 256. To Quilca, a Country-House of Dr. Sheridan, in no very good Repair. 1725.

LET me thy properties explain:
A rotten cabin, dropping rain;
Chimneys with scorn rejecting smoke;
Stools, tables, chairs, and bedsteads, broke.
Here elements have lost their uses:
Air ripens not, nor earth produces;
In vain we make poor Shelah* toil,
Fire will not roast, nor water boil.
Through all the valleys, hills, and plains,
The goddess Want in triumph reigns:
And her chief officers of state,
Sloth, Dirt, and Theft, around her wait.

§ 257. The grand Question debated, whether Hamilton's Bawn should be turned into a Barrack or a Malt-House. 1729.

THUS spoke to my Lady the Knight† full of care:

"Let me have your advice in a weighty affair:
This Hamilton's Bawn‡ whilst it sticks on my hand,

I lose by the house what I get by the land;
But how to dispose of it to the best bidder,
For a barrack § or malt-house, we now must consider.

"First let me suppose I make it a malt-house,
Here I have computed the profit will fall thus;
There's nine hundred pounds for labor and grain,

[main;
I increase it to twelve, so three hundred re-
A handsome addition for wine and good cheer,
Three dishes a day, and three hogsheads a year:
With a dozen large vessels my vault shall be stored;

No little scrub joint shall come on my board,
And you and the Dean no more shall combine
To stint me at night to one bottle of wine;
Nor shall I, for his humor, permit you to pur-loin

A stone and a quarter of beef from my sirloin.
If I make it a barrack, the crown is my tenant;
My dear, I have ponder'd again and again on't:
In poundage and drawbacks I lose half my rent;
Whatever they give me, I must be content,
Or join with the court in every debate,
And rather than that I would lose my estate."

Thus ended the Knight. Thus began his meek wife:

"It must and it shall be a barrack, my life.
I'm grown a mere mopus; no company comes
But a rabble of tenants and rusty dull rums ||:

With parsons what lady can keep herself clean?
I'm all over daub'd when I sit by the Dean.
But if you will give us a barrack, my dear,
The Captain, I'm sure, will always come here;
I then shall not value his Deanship a straw,
For the Captain, I warrant, will keep him in awe;

Or, should he pretend to be brisk and alert,
Will tell him that chaplains should not be so pert;

That men of his coat should be minding their pray'rs,

And not among ladies to give themselves airs."
Thus argued my Lady, but argued in vain;
The Knight his opinion resolv'd to maintain.

But Hannah¶, who listen'd to all that was
past,

And could not endure so vulgar a taste,
As soon as her Ladyship call'd to be dress'd, Cried, "Madam, why surely my master's possessed.

Sir Arthur the maltster! how fine it will sound!
I'd rather the bawn were sunk under ground.
But, Madam, I guess'd there would never come
good,

When I saw him so often with Darby and
Wood**.

And now my dream's out; for I was a-dream'd
That I saw a huge rat—O dear, how I scream'd!
And after, methought, I had lost my new shoes;
And Molly she said I should hear some ill news.

"Dear madam, had you but the spirit to tease,
You might have a barrack whenever you please:
And, madam, I always believ'd you so stout,
That for twenty denials you would not give out.
If I had a husband like him, I purtest,
Till he gave me my will, I would give him no
rest;

And, rather than come in the same pair of sheets
With such a cross man, I would lie in the streets:

But, madam, I beg you, contrive and invent,
And worry him out till he gives his consent.
Dear madam, whene'er of a barrack I think,
An I were to be hang'd, I can't sleep a wink:
For if a new crotchet comes into my brain,
I can't get it out, though I never so fain.

I fancy already a barrack contriv'd
At Hamilton's Bawn, and the troop is arriv'd;
Of this to be sure Sir Arthur has warning,
And waits on the Captain betimes the next morning.

[behave;
Now see, when they meet, how their honors
'Noble Captain, your servant.'—'Sir Arthur,
your slave:

You honor me much.'—'The honor is mine.'
'Twas a sad rainy night.'—'But the morning is fine.'

'Pray how does my Lady?'—'My wife's at your service.'

'I think I have seen her picture by Jervas.'—

§ The army in Ireland is lodged in strong buildings over the whole kingdom, called barracks.

|| A cant word in Ireland for a poor country-clergyman. ¶ My lady's waiting-woman.

** Two of Sir Arthur's managers.

‘ Good morrow, good Captain, I’ll wait on you down.’
 ‘ You shan’t stir a foot.’—‘ You’ll think me a clown.
 For all the world, Captain.’—‘ Not half an inch farther.’
 ‘ You must be obey’d!’—‘ Your servant, Sir Arthur!’
 My humble respects to my Lady unknown.’
 ‘ I hope you will use my house as your own.’”
 “ Go bring me my smock, and leave off your prate,
 Thou hast certainly got a cup in thy pate.”
 “ Pray, madam, be quiet, what was it I said?
 You had like to have put it quite out of my head.
 Next day, to be sure, the Captain will come
 At the head of his troop, with trumpet and drum. [state:
 Now, madam, observe how he marches in
 The man with the kettle-drums enters the gate;
 Dub, dub, adub, dub. The trumpeters follow,
 Tantara, tantara; while all the boys halloo.
 See now comes the Captain, all daub’d with gold lace:
 O la! the sweet gentleman! look in his face;
 And see how he rides like a lord of the land,
 With the fine flaming sword that he holds in his hand;
 And his horse, the dear cretur, it prances and rears,
 With ribands in knots at its tail and its ears:
 At last comes the troop, by the word of command,
 Drawn up in our court; when the Captain cries,
 STAND!
 Your Ladyship lifts up the sash to be seen
 (For sure I have dizen’d you out like a queen).
 The Captain, to show he is proud of the favor,
 Looks up to your window, and cocks up his beaver;
 (His beaver is cock’d; pray, madam, mark that,
 For a Captain of horse never takes off his hat,
 Because he has never a hand that is idle;
 For the right holds the sword, and the left holds the bridle;)
 Then flourishes thrice his sword in the air,
 As a compliment due to a lady so fair;
 (How I tremble to think of the blood it hath spilt!)
 Then he lowers down the point, and kisses the hilt.
 Your ladyship smiles, and thus you begin:
 ‘ Pray, Captain, be pleas’d to alight and walk in.’
 The Captain salutes you with congee profound,
 And your Ladyship curtsies half-way to the ground.
 ‘ Kit, run to your master, and bid him come to us:
 I’m sure he’ll be proud of the honor you do us.
 And, Captain, you’ll do us the favor to stay
 And take a short dinner here with us to-day:
 You’re heartily welcome: but as for good cheer,
 You come in the very worst time of the year;

If I had expected so worthy a guest—’
 ‘ Lord, madam! your ladyship sure is in jest:
 You banter me, madam.’—‘ The kingdom must grant,
 You officers, Captain, are so complaisant!’”
 “ Hist, hussy, I think I hear somebody coming.”
 “ No, madam, ’tis only Sir Arthur a humming.
 To shorten my tale (for I hate a long story)
 The Captain at dinner appears in his glory:
 The Dean and the Doctor * have humbled their pride,
 For the Captain’s entreated to sit by your side:
 And, because he’s their betters, you carve for him first:
 The parsons for envy are ready to burst.
 The servants, amazed, are scarce ever able
 To keep off their eyes, as they wait at the table;
 And Molly and I have thrust in our nose
 To peep at the Captain in all his fine clo’es.
 Dear madam, be sure he’s a fine spoken man,
 Do but hear on the Clergy how glib his tongue ran:
 And, ‘ Madam,’ says he ‘ if such dinners you give, [live.
 You’ll ne’er want for parsons as long as you
 I ne’er knew a parson without a good nose:
 But the Devil’s as welcome wherever he goes.
 G—d—n me! they bid us reform and repent,
 But, z—ds! by their looks they never keep Lent. [afraid

 My schoolmaster call’d me a dunce and a fool,
 But at cuffs I was always the cock of the school:
 I never could take to my book for the blood o’ me, [o’ me.
 And the puppy confess’d he expected no good
 He caught me one morning coquetting his wife, [life:
 But he maul’d me, I ne’er was so maul’d in my

§ 258. On the Death of Dr. Swift. Occasioned by reading the following Maxim in Rochefoucault: "Dans l'adversité de nos meilleurs amis, nous trouvons toujours quelque chose qui ne nous deplait pas."

"In the adversity of our best friends we always find something that doth not displease us."

As Rochefoucault his maxims drew
From nature, I believe them true:
They argue no corrupted mind
In him; the fault is in mankind.

This maxim more than all the rest
Is thought too base for human breast:
"In all distresses of our friends,
We first consult our private ends;
While nature, kindly bent to ease us,
Points out some circumstance to please us."

If this perhaps your patience move,
Let reason and experience prove.

We all behold with envious eyes
Our equals rais'd above our size.
Who would not at a crowded show
Stand high himself, keep others low?
I love my friend as well as you;
But why should he obstruct my view?
Then let me have the higher post,
Suppose it but an inch at most.
If in a battle you should find
One, whom you love of all mankind,
Had some heroic action done,
A champion kill'd, or trophy won:
Rather than thus be over-topt,
Would you not wish his laurels cropt?
Dear honest Ned is in the gout,
Lies rack'd with pain, and you without:
How patiently you hear him groan!
How glad the case is not your own!

What poet would not grieve to see
His brothers write as well as he;
But, rather than they should excel,
Would wish his rivals all in hell?

Her end when Emulation misses,
She turns to Envy, stings and hisses:
The strongest friendship yields to pride,
Unless the odds be on our side.
Vain human kind! fantastic race!
Thy various follies who can trace?
Self-love, ambition, envy, pride,
Their empire in our hearts divide.
Give others riches, pow'r, and station,
'Tis all to me an usurpation.
I have no title to aspire;
Yet, when you sink, I seem the higher.
In Pope I cannot read a line,
But, with a sigh, I wish it mine:
When he can in one couplet fix
More sense than I can do in six,
It gives me such a jealous fit,
I cry, "Pox take him and his wit!"
I grieve to be outdone by Gay
In my own humorous biting way.
Arbuthnot is no more my friend,
Who dares to irony pretend,
Which I was born to introduce,
Refin'd it first, and show'd its use.
St. John as well as Pulteney knows
That I had some repute for prose;
And, till they drove me out of date,
Could maul a minister of state.
If they have mortified my pride,
And made me throw my pen aside;
If with such talents heaven hath bless'd 'em,
Have I not reason to detest 'em?

To all my foes, dear Fortune, send
Thy gifts, but never to my friend:
I tamely can endure the first;
But this with envy makes me burst.

Thus much may serve by way of proem;
Proceed we therefore to our poem.

The time is not remote, when I
Must, by the course of nature, die!
When, I foresee, my special friends
Will try to find their private ends:
And, though 'tis hardly understood
Which way my death may do them good,
Yet thus, methinks, I hear them speak:
"See how the Dean begins to break!
Poor gentleman, he droops apace!
You plainly find it in his face.
That old vertigo in his head
Will never leave him till he's dead,
Besides, his memory decays:
He recollects not what he says:
He cannot call his friends to mind;
Forgets the place where last he din'd;
Plies you with stories o'er and o'er;
He told them fifty times before.
How does he fancy we can sit
To hear this out-of-fashion wit?
But he takes up with younger folks,
Who for his wine will bear his jokes.
Faith! he must make his stories shorter,
Or change his comrades once a quarter:
In half the time he talks them round,
There must another set be found.
"For poetry he's past his prime:
He takes an hour to find a rhyme;

His fire is out, his wit decay'd,
His fancy sunk, his Muse a jade.
I'd have him throw away his pen;
But there's no talking to some men!"

And then their tenderness appears
By adding largely to my years:
"He's older than he would be reckon'd,
And well remembers Charles the Second.
He hardly drinks a pint of wine;
And that, I doubt, is no good sign.
His stomach too begins to fail:
Last year we thought him strong and hale;
But now he's quite another thing:
I wish he may hold out till spring!"
They hug themselves, and reason thus:
"It is not yet so bad with us!"

In such a case they talk in tropes,
And by their fears express their hopes:
Some great misfortune to portend,
No enemy can match a friend;
With all the kindness they profess,
The merit of a lucky guess
(When daily how-d'ye's come of course,
And servants answer, "Worse and worse!")
Would please them better, than to tell
That, "God be prais'd, the Dean is well."
Then he who prophesied the best,
Approves his foresight to the rest:
"You know I always fear'd the worst,
And often told you so at first."
He'd rather choose that I should die,
Than his predictions prove a lie.
Not one foretels I should recover;
But all agree to give me over.

Yet, should some neighbour feel a pain
Just in the parts where I complain;
How many a message would he send,
With hearty pray'rs that I should mend!
Inquire what regimen I kept,
What gave me ease, and how I slept;
And more lament when I was dead,
Than all the sniv'lers round my bed.

My good companions, never fear;
For though you may mistake a year,
Though your prognostics run too fast,
They must be verified at last.

Behold the fatal day arrive!
"How is the Dean?"—"He's just alive."
Now the departing-pray'r is read;
"He hardly breathes—the Dean is dead!"

Before the passing-bell begun,
The news through half the town is run;
"O may we all for death prepare!
What has he left? and who's his heir?
I know no more than what the news is;
'Tis all bequeath'd to public uses.
To public uses! there's a whim;
What had the public done for him?
Mere envy, avarice, and pride!
He gave it all—but first he died.
And had the Dean, in all the nation,
No worthy friend, no poor relation?
So ready to do strangers good,
Forgetting his own flesh and blood!"

Now Grub-street wits are all employ'd;
With elegies the town is cloy'd:
Some paragraph in every paper,
To curse the Dean, or bless the Drapier.

The Doctors, tender of their fame,
Wisely on me lay all the blame.
"We must confess his case was nice,
But he would never take advice.
Had he been rul'd, for aught appears,
He might have liv'd these twenty years;
For when we open'd him, we found
That all his vital parts were sound."

From Dublin soon to London spread,
'Tis told at court, "The Dean is dead."
And Lady Suffolk*, in the spleen,
Runs laughing up to tell the Queen:
The Queen, so gracious, mild, and good,
Cries, "Is he gone? 'tis time he should.
He's dead, you say? then let him rot:
I'm glad the medals† were forgot.
I promis'd him, I own; but when?
I only was the Princess then:
But now, as consort of the King,
You know, 'tis quite another thing."

Now Chartres, at Sir Robert's levee,
Tells, with a sneer, the tidings heavy:
"Why, if he died without his shoes,"
Cries Bob, "I'm sorry for the news.
O were the wretch but living still,
And in his place my good friend Will!
Or had a mitre on his head,
Provided Bolingbroke were dead!"

Now Curll his shop from rubbish drains:
"Three genuine tomes of Swift's remains!"
And then, to make them pass the glibber,
"Revis'd by Tibbald, Moore, and Cibber."
He'll treat me as he does my betters,
Publish my will, my life, my letters,
Revive the libels born to die,
Which Pope must bear as well as I.

Here shift the scene, to represent
How those I lov'd my death lament.
Poor Pope will grieve a month, and Gay
A week, and Arbuthnot a day:
St. John himself will scarce forbear
To bite his pen and drop a tear.
The rest will give a shrug, and cry,
"I'm sorry—but we all must die!"

Indifference, clad in Wisdom's guise,
All fortitude of mind supplies:
For how can stony bowels melt
In those who never pity felt?
When we are lash'd they kiss the rod,
Resigning to the will of God.

The fools, my juniors by a year,
Are tortur'd with suspense and fear;
Who wisely thought my age a screen,
When death approach'd, to stand between:
The screen remov'd, their hearts are trembling:
They mourn for me without dissembling.

My female friends, whose tender hearts
Have better learn'd to act their parts,
Receive the news in doleful dumps:
"The Dean is dead: (pray what is trumps?)

* Mrs. Howard, at one time a favourite with the Dean.

† Which the Dean in vain expected, in return for a small present he had sent to the Princess.

Then Lord have mercy on his soul !
 (Ladies, I'll venture for the vole)
 Six Deans, they say, must bear the pall :
 (I wish I knew what king to call.)
 Madam, your husband will attend
 The funeral of so good a friend ?"
 " No, madam, 'tis a shocking sight ;
 And he's engag'd to-morrow night :
 My Lady Club will take it ill
 If he should fail at her quadrille.
 He lov'd the Dean—(I lead a heart)—
 But dearest friends, they say, must part.
 His time was come : he ran his race ;
 We hope he's in a better place."

Why do we grieve that friends should die ?
 No loss more easy to supply :
 One year is past—a different scene !
 No farther mention of the Dean ;
 Who now, alas ! no more is miss'd
 Than if he never did exist.
 Where's now the favourite of Apollo ?
 Departed—and his works must follow ;
 Must undergo the common fate ;
 His kind of wit is out of date.

Some country squire to Lintot goes,
 Inquires for Swift in verse and prose.
 Says Lintot, " I have heard the name ;
 He died a year ago ?"—" The same."
 He searches all the shop in vain :
 " Sir, you may find them in Duck-lane :
 I sent them with a load of books,
 Last Monday, to the pastry-cook's.
 To fancy they could live a year !
 I find you're but a stranger here.
 The Dean was famous in his time,
 And had a kind of knack at rhyme.
 His way of writing now is past :
 The town has got a better taste.
 I keep no antiquated stuff ;
 But spick and span I have enough.
 Pray do but give me leave to show 'em :
 Here's Colley Cibber's birth-day poem ;
 This ode you never yet have seen,
 By Stephen Duck upon the Queen.
 Then here's a letter finely penn'd
 Against the Craftsman and his friend :
 It clearly shows that all reflection
 On ministers is disaffection.
 Next, here's Sir Robert's vindication,
 And Mr. Henley's last oration ;
 The hawkers have not got them yet :
 Your honor please to buy a set ? [tion ;

" Here's Wolston's tracts, the twelfth edi-
 'Tis read by every politician :
 The country-members, when in town,
 To all their boroughs send them down :
 You never met a thing so smart ;
 The courtiers have them all by heart.
 Those maids of honor who can read
 Are taught to use them for their creed ;
 The reverend author's good intention
 Hath been rewarded with a pension* :
 He doth an honor to his gown,
 By bravely running priestcraft down :
 He shows, as sure as God's in Glo'ster,
 That Moses was a grand impostor ;

That all his miracles were cheats,
 Perform'd as jugglers do their feats :
 The church had never such a writer ;
 A shame he hath not got a mitre !"

Suppose me dead ; and then suppose
 A club assembled at the Rose ;
 Where, from discourse of this and that,
 I grow the subject of their chat :
 And while they toss my name about,
 With favor some, and some without,
 One, quite indifferent in the cause,
 My character impartial draws :
 " The Dean, if we believe report,
 Was never ill receiv'd at court ;
 Although, ironically grave,
 He sham'd the fool, and lash'd the knave ;
 To steal a hint was never known,
 But what he writ was all his own."

" Sir, I have heard another story :
 He was a most confounded Tory ;
 And grew, or he is much belied,
 Extremely dull before he died."

" Can we the Drapier then forget ?
 Is not our nation in his debt ?
 'Twas he that writ the Drapier's Letters !"

" He should have left them for his betters ;
 We had a hundred abler men,
 Nor need depend upon his pen.
 Say what you will about his reading,
 You never can defend his breeding ;
 Who, in his satires running riot,
 Could never leave the world in quiet ;
 Attacking, when he took the whim,
 Court, city, camp—all one to him.
 But why should he, except he slobber'd,
 Offend our patriot, great Sir Robert,
 Whose counsels aid the sovereign pow'r
 To save the nation every hour ?
 What scenes of evil he unravels
 In satires, libels, lying travels :
 Not sparing his own clergy-cloth,
 But eats into it, like a moth !"

" Perhaps I may allow the Dean
 Had too much satire in his vein,
 And seem'd determin'd not to starve it,
 Because no age could more deserve it.
 Yet malice never was his aim ;
 He lash'd the vice, but spar'd the name.
 No individual could resent,
 Where thousands equally were meant :
 His satire points at no defect
 But what all mortals may correct ;
 For he abhorr'd the senseless tribe
 Who call it humor when they jibe.
 He spar'd a hump or crooked nose,
 Whose owners set not up for beaux :
 True genuine dulness mov'd his pity,
 Unless it offer'd to be witty.
 Those who their ignorance confess'd
 He ne'er offended with a jest ;
 But laugh'd to hear an idiot quote
 A verse from Horace learn'd by rote.
 Vice, if it e'er can be abash'd,
 Must be or ridicul'd or lash'd.
 If you resent it, who's to blame ?
 He neither knows you, nor your name.

* Wolston is here confounded with Wollaston.

Should vice expect to 'scape rebuke,
Because its owner is a duke?
His friendships, still to few confin'd,
Were always of the middling kind;
No fools of rank or mongrel breed,
Who fain would pass for lords indeed:
Where titles give no right or pow'r,
And peerage is a wither'd flow'r,
He would have deem'd it a disgrace
If such a wretch had known his face.
On rural squires, that kingdom's bane,
He vented oft his wrath in vain.

—— squires to market brought,
Who sell their souls and —— for nought;
The —— go joyful back,
To rob the church, their tenants rack,
Go snack with —— justices,
And keep the peace to pick up fees;
In every job to have a share,
A gaol or turnpike to repair;
And turn —— to public roads
Commodious to their own abodes.

“ He never thought an honor done him
Because a peer was proud to own him;
Would rather slip aside, and choose
To talk with wits in dirty shoes;
And scorn the tools with stars and garters,
So often seen caressing Chartres.
He never courted men in station;
No persons held in admiration;
Of no man's greatness was afraid,
Because he sought for no man's aid.
Though trusted long in great affairs,
He gave himself no haughty airs;
Without regarding private ends,
Spent all his credit for his friends;
And only chose the wise and good,
No flatterers, no allies in blood,
But succour'd virtue in distress,
And seldom fail'd of good success;
As numbers in their heart must own,
Who, but for him, had been unknown.
He kept with princes due decorum,
Yet never stood in awe before 'em.
He follow'd David's lesson just;
In princes never put his trust;
And, would you make him truly sour,
Provoke him with a slave in pow'r.
The Irish senate if you nam'd,
With what impatience he declaim'd!
Fair LIBERTY was all his cry,
For her he stood prepar'd to die;
For her he boldly stood alone;
For her he oft expos'd his own.
Two kingdoms, just as faction led,
Had set a price upon his head:
But not a traitor could be found,
To sell him for six hundred pound.

“ Had he but spar'd his tongue and pen,
He might have rose like other men:
But pow'r was never in his thought,
And wealth he valued not a groat:
Ingratitude he often found,
And pitied those who meant the wound:
But kept the tenor of his mind,
To merit well of human-kind;

Nor made a sacrifice of those
Who still were true, to please his foes.
He labor'd many a fruitless hour
To reconcile his friends in pow'r;
Saw mischief by a faction brewing,
While they pursued each other's ruin!
But, finding vain was all his care,
He left the court in mere despair.

“ And, O! how short are human schemes!
Here ended all our golden dreams.
What St. John's skill in state-affairs,
What Ormond's valour, Oxford's cares,
To save their sinking country lent,
Was all destroy'd by one event.
Too soon that precious life was ended,
On which alone our weal depended:
When up a dangerous faction starts,
With wrath and vengeance in their hearts;
By solemn league and cov'nant bound,
To ruin, slaughter, and confound;
To turn religion to a fable,
And make the government a Babel;
Pervert the laws, disgrace the gown,
Corrupt the senate, rob the crown;
To sacrifice Old England's glory,
And make her infamous in story.
When such a tempest shook the land,
How could unguarded Virtue stand?
With horror, grief, despair, the Dean
Beheld the dire destructive scene:
His friends in exile, or the Tower,
Himself within the frown of power;
Pursued by base envenom'd pens,
Far to the land of s—— and fens;
A servile race in folly nurst,
Who truckle most when treated worst.

“ By innocence and resolution,
He bore continual persecution;
While numbers to preferment rose,
Whose merit was, to be his foes:
When e'en his own particular friends,
Intent upon their private ends,
Like renegadoes now he feels
Against him lifting up their heels.
The Dean did, by his pen, defeat
An infamous, destructive cheat;
Taught fools their interest how to know,
And gave them arms to ward the blow.
Envy hath own'd it was his doing,
To save that hapless land from ruin;
While they who at the steerage stood,
And reap'd the profit, sought his blood.
To save them from their evil fate,
In him was held a crime of state.
A wicked monster on the bench,
Whose fury blood could never quench;
As vile and profligate a villain
As modern Scroggs, or old Tressilian;
Who long all justice had discarded,
Nor fear'd he God, nor man regarded;
Vow'd on the Dean his rage to vent,
And make him of his zeal repent.
But heaven his innocence defends,
The grateful people stand his friends:
Not strains of law, nor judge's frown,
Nor topics brought to please the crown,

Nor witness hir'd, nor jury pick'd,
Prevail to bring him in convict.

"In exile, with a steady heart,
He spent his life's declining part;
Where folly, pride, and faction, sway,
Remote from St. John, Pope, and Gay."—

"Alas, poor Dean! his only scope
Was, to be held a misanthrope;
This into general odium drew him;
Which if he lik'd, much good may't do him.
His zeal was not to lash our crimes,
But discontent against the times;
For had we made him timely offers
To raise his post, or fill his coffers,
Perhaps he might have truckled down,
Like other brethren of his gown;
For party he would scarce have bled:
I say no more—because he's dead.
What writings has he left behind?"

"I hear they're of a different kind:
A few in verse, but most in prose."

"Some high-flown pamphlets, I suppose:
All scribbled in the worst of times,
To palliate his friend Oxford's crimes;
To praise Queen Anne; nay more, defend her,
As never favouring the Pretender;
Or libels yet conceal'd from sight,
Against the court to show his spite.
Perhaps his Travels, part the third;
A lie at every second word—
Offensive to a loyal ear;
But not one sermon, you may swear."

"He knew an hundred pleasing stories,
With all the turns of Whigs and Tories:
Was cheerful to his dying day,
And friends would let him have his way.
As for his works in verse or prose,
I own myself no judge of those;
Now can I tell what critics thought them,
But this I know—all people bought them,
As with a moral view design'd
To please and to reform mankind:
And, if he often miss'd his aim,
The world must own it to their shame,
The praise is his, and theirs the blame.
He gave the little wealth he had,
To build a house for fools and mad;
To show, by one satiric touch,
No nation wanted it so much.
That kingdom he hath left his debtor,
I wish it soon may have a better:
And since you dread no farther lashes,
Methinks you may forgive his ashes."

§ 259. The Author. CHURCHILL.

ACCURS'D the man whom fate ordains, in spite,
And cruel parents teach, to read and write!
What need of letters? Wherefore should we spell?

Why write our names? A mark will do as well.
Much are the precious hours of youth mis-
spent

In climbing Learning's rugged, steep ascent!
When to the top the bold advent'rer's got,
He reigns vain monarch o'er a barren spot:

Whilst, in the vale of Ignorance below,
Folly and vice to rank luxuriance grow;
Honors and wealth pour in on every side,
And proud preferment rolls her golden tide.

O'er crabbed authors life's gay prime to waste,
To cramp wild genius in the chains of taste;
To bear the slavish drudgery of schools,
And tamely stoop to ev'ry pedant's rules;
For seven long years debarr'd of lib'ral ease,
To plod in college-trammels to degrees;
Beneath the weight of solemn toys to groan,
Sleep over books, and leave mankind unknown;
To praise each senior blockhead's threadbare tale,

And laugh till reason blush, and spirits fail;
Manhood with vile submission to disgrace,
And cap the fool whose merit is his place;
Vice-chancellors whose knowledge is but small,

And chancellors who nothing know at all;
Ill brook'd the gen'rous spirit, in those days
When learning was the certain road to praise,
When nobles, with a love of science bless'd,
Approv'd in others what themselves possess'd.

But now, when Dulness rears aloft her throne,
When lordly vassals her wide empire own;
When Wit, seduc'd by Envy, starts aside,
And basely leagues with Ignorance and Pride;
What now should tempt us, by false hopes misled,

Learning's unfashionable paths to tread:
To bear those labors which our fathers bore,
That crown withheld which they in triumph
wore?

When with much pains this boasted learn-ing's got,
'Tis an affront to those who have it not.
In some it causes hate, in others fear,
Instructs our foes to rail, our friends to sneer.
With prudent haste the worldly-minded fool
Forgets the little which he learn'd at school;
The elder brother, to vast fortunes born,
Looks on all science with an eye of scorn;
Dependent brethren the same features wear,
And younger sons are stupid as the heir.
In senates, at the bar, in church and state,
Genius is vile, and learning out of date.

Is this—O death to think! is this the land
Where Merit and Reward went hand in hand;
Where heroes parent-like the Poet view'd,
By whom they saw their glorious deeds renew'd;
Where Poets, true to honor, tun'd their lays,
And by their Patrons sanctify'd their praise?
Is this the land where on our Spenser's tongue,
Enamour'd of his voice, Description hung;
Where Jonson rigid gravity beguil'd,
Whilst Reason thro' her critic fences smil'd;
Where Nature list'ning stood while Shakspeare
play'd,

And wonder'd at the work herself had made?
Is this the land, where, mindful of her charge
And office high, fair Freedom walk'd at large;
Where, finding in our laws a sure defence,
She mock'd at all restraints, but those of Sense;
Where, Health and Honor trooping by her side,
She spread her sacred empire far and wide;

Pointed the way Affliction to beguile,
And bade the face of Sorrow wear a smile;
Bade those who dare obey the gen'rous call,
Enjoy her blessings, which God meant for all?
Is this the land, where, in some tyrant's reign,
When a weak, wicked, ministerial train,
The tools of pow'r, the slaves of int'rest, plann'd
Their country's ruin, and with bribes unmann'd

Those wretches who, ordain'd in Freedom's
cause,

Gave up our liberties, and sold our laws; [go,
When Pow'r was taught by Meanness where to
Nor dar'd to love the virtue of a foe;
When, like a lep'rous plague, from the foul head
To the foul heart her sores Corruption spread;
Her iron arm when stern Oppression rear'd,
And Virtue, from her broad base shaken, fear'd
Thescourge of Vice; when, impotent and vain,
Poor Freedom bow'd the neck to Slavery's chain:—

Is this the land, where, in those worst of times,
The hardy Poet rais'd his honest rhymes
To dread rebuke, and bade controlment speak
In guilty blushes on the villain's cheek:
Bade Pow'r turn pale, kept mighty rogues in awe,
And made them fear the Muse, who fear'd not Law?

How do I laugh when men of narrow souls,
Whom folly guides and prejudice controls;
Who one dull drowsy track of business trod,
Worship their Mammon, and neglect their
God;

Who, breathing by one musty set of rules,
Dote from the birth, and are by system fools;
Who, form'd to dulness from their very youth,
Lies of the day prefer to Gospel truth;
Pick up their little knowledge from Reviews,
And lay out all their stock of faith in news:
How do I laugh, when creatures form'd like these, [please,

Whom Reason scorns, and I should blush to Rail at all lib'ral arts, deem verse a crime,
And hold not Truth as Truth if told in rhyme!

How do I laugh, when Publius, hoary grown
In zeal for Scotland's welfare and his own,
By slow degrees, and course of office, drawn
In mood and figure at the helm to yawn;
Too mean (the worst of curses Heav'n can send)
To have a foe, too proud to have a friend,
Erring by form, which blockheads sacred hold,
Ne'er making new faults, and ne'er mending
old;

Rebukes my spirit, bids the daring Muse
Subjects more equal to her weakness choose;
Bids her frequent the haunts of humble swains,
Nor dare to traffic in ambitious strains;
Bids her, indulging the poetic whim
In quaint-wrought ode, or sonnet pertly trim,
Along the church-way path complain with Gray,

Or dance with Mason on the first of May!
“All sacred is the name and power of Kings;
And States and Statesmen are those mighty
things,
Which, howsoe'er they out of course may roll,
Were never made for Poets to control.”

Peace, peace, thou dotard! nor thus vilely deem
Of sacred numbers, and their pow'r blaspheme;
I tell thee, wretch, search all creation round,
In earth, in heav'n, no subject can be found
(Our God alone except), above whose weight
The Poet cannot rise, and hold his state.
The blessed Saints above in numbers speak
The praise of God, though there all praise is weak;

In numbers here below the Bard shall teach
Virtue to soar beyond the villain's reach;
Shall tear his lab'ring lungs, strain his hoarse throat,

And raise his voice beyond the trumpet's note,
Should an afflicted country, aw'd by men
Of slavish principles, demand his pen.
This is a great, a glorious point of view,
Fit for an English Poet to pursue,
Undaunted to pursue, though in return
His writings by the common hangman burn.

How do I laugh when men, by fortune plac'd
Above their betters, and by rank disgrac'd;
Who found their pride on titles which they stain,

And, mean themselves, are of their fathers vain;
Who would a bill of privilege prefer,
And treat a Poet like a creditor;

The gen'rous ardor of the Muse condemn,
And curse the storm they know must break on them!

“What, shall a reptile Bard, a wretch unknown,

Without one badge of merit but his own,
Great Nobles lash, and Lords like common men
Smart from the vengeance of a scribbler's pen?”

What's in the name of Lord, that I should
fear

To bring their vices to the public ear?
Flows not the honest blood of humble swains
Quick as the tide which swells a monarch's veins?

Monarchs, who wealth and titles can bestow,
Cannot make virtues in succession flow.

Wouldst thou, proud man, be safely plac'd above

The censure of the Muse, deserve her love;
Act as thy birth demands, as nobles ought;
Look back, and, by thy worthy father taught,
Who earn'd those honors thou wert born to
wear,

Follow his steps, and be his virtue's heir.
But if, regardless of the road to Fame,
You start aside, and tread the paths of Shame;
If such thy life, that, should thy sire arise,
The sight of such a son would blast his eyes;
Would make him curse the hour which gave thee birth; [earth,

Would drive him, shudd'ring, from the face of Once more, with shame and sorrow, 'mongst
the dead,

In endless night to hide his rev'rend head;
If such thy life, though king hath made thee
more

Than ever king a scoundrel made before;
Nay, to allow thy pride a deeper spring,
Though God in vengeance had made thee a king;

Taking on Virtue's wing her daring flight,
The Muse should drag thee trembling to the
light,

Probe thy foul wounds, and lay thy bosom bare
To the keen question of the searching air.

Gods! with what pride I see the titled slave,
Who smarts beneath the stroke which Satire gave,

Aiming at ease, and with dishonest art
Striving to hide the feelings of his heart!
How do I laugh, when, with affected air,
(Scarce able, through despite, to keep his chair,
Whilst on his trembling lip pale anger speaks,
And the chaf'd blood flies mounting to his cheeks,) [cures

He talks of "Conscience, which good men se-
From all those evil moments guilt endures,"

And seems to laugh at those who pay regard
To the wild ravings of a frantic bard!

"Satire, whilst envy and ill humor sway
The mind of man, must always make her way;
Nor to a bosom with discretion fraught
Is all her malice worth a single thought:
The Wise have not the will, nor Fools the pow'r,

To stop her headstrong course: within the hour,
Left to herself, she dies; opposing strife
Gives her fresh vigor, and prolongs her life.
All things her prey, and every man her aim,
I can no patent for exemption claim;
Nor would I wish to stop that harmless dart
Which plays around, but cannot wound, my heart:

Though pointed at myself, be Satire free;
To her 'tis pleasure, and no pain to me."

Dissembling wretch! hence to the Stoic
school,

And there amongst thy brethren play the fool;
There unrebuk'd, these wild, vain doctrines preach:

Lives there a man, whom Satire cannot reach?
Lives there a man, who calmly can stand by,
And see his conscience ripp'd, with steady eye?
When Satire flies abroad on Falsehood's wing,
Short is her life, and impotent her sting;
But when to Truth allied, the wound she gives
Sinks deep, and to remotest ages lives.

When in the tomb thy pamper'd flesh shall rot,
And e'en by friends thy mem'ry be forgot,
Still shalt thou live, recorded for thy crimes,
Live in her page, and stink to after-times.

Hast thou no feeling yet? Come, throw off
pride,

And own those passions which thou shalt not hide.

S——, who, from the moment of his birth,
Made human nature a reproach on earth;
Who never dar'd, nor wish'd, behind to stay,
When Folly, Vice, and Meanness, led the way;
Would blush, should he be told, by Truth and Wit,

Those actions which he blush'd not to commit:
Men the most infamous are fond of fame;
And those who fear not guilt, yet start at shame.

But whither runs my zeal, whose rapid force,
Turning the brain, bears Reason from her course;

Carries me back to times, when poets, bless'd
With courage, grac'd the science they profess'd;
When they, in honor rooted, firmly stood,
The bad to punish, and reward the good;
When, to a flame by Public Virtue wrought,
The foes of Freedom they to justice brought,
And dar'd expose those slaves, who dar'd support

A tyrant plan, and call'd themselves a Court?
Ah! what are Poets now? As slavish those Who deal in verse, as those who deal in prose.
Is there an author, search the kingdom round,
In whom true worth and real spirit's found?
The slaves of booksellers, or (doom'd by fate
To baser chains) vile pensioners of State;
Some, dead to shame, and of those shackles proud

Which Honor scorns, for slavery roar loud;
Others, half-palsied only, mutes become,
And what makes Smollett write makes Johnson dumb. [eye

Why turns yon villain pale? why bends his Inward, abash'd, when Murphy passes by?
Dost thou sage Murphy for a blockhead take,
Who wages war with Vice for Virtue's sake?
No, no—like other worldlings, you will find
He shifts his sails, and catches ev'ry wind.
His soul the shock of int'rest can't endure;
Give him a pension then, and sin secure.

With laurel'd wreaths the flatt'rer's brows adorn,

Bid Virtue crouch, bid Vice exalt her horn,
Bid Cowards thrive, put Honesty to flight,
Murphy shall prove, or try to prove, it right.
Try, thou State-Juggler, ev'ry paltry art,
Ransack the inmost closet of my heart,
Swear thou'rt my friend; by that base oath make
way

Into my breast, and flatter to betray:
Or, if those tricks are vain; if wholesome
doubt

Detects the fraud, and points the villain out;
Bribe those who daily at my board are fed,
And make them take my life who eat my bread;
On authors for defence, for praise, depend;
Pay him but well, and Murphy is thy friend.
He, he shall ready stand with venal rhymes,
To varnish guilt and consecrate thy crimes,
To make corruption in false colors shine,
And damn his own good name to rescue thine.

But if thy niggard hands their gifts withhold,
And Vice no longer rains down show'rs of gold,
Expect no mercy; facts, well grounded, teach,
Murphy, if not rewarded, will impeach.
What tho' each man of nice and juster thought,
Shunning his steps, decrees, by Honor taught,
He ne'er can be a friend who stoops so low
To be the base betrayer of a foe?

What tho', with thine together link'd, his name
Must be with thine transmitted down to shame?
To ev'ry manly feeling callous grown,
Rather than not blast thine, he'll blast his own.

To ope the fountain whence Sedition springs,
To slander Government, and libel Kings;
With Freedom's name to serve a present hour,
Though born and bred to arbitrary pow'r;

To talk of William with insidious art,
 Whilst a vile Stuart's lurking in his heart;
 And, whilst mean Envy rears her loathsome
     head,
 Flatt'ring the living, to abuse the dead;
 Where is Shebbeare? O, let not foul Reproach,
 Travelling hither in a city-coach,
 The pill'ry dare to name; the whole intent
 Of that parade was fame, not punishment;
 And that old staunch Whig Beardmore, standing by,
 Can in full court give that report the lie.

With rude unnat'ral jargon to support,
 Half Scotch, half English, a declining Court;
 To make most glaring contraries unite,
 And prove, beyond dispute, that black is white;
 To make firm Honor tamely league with Shame,
 Make Vice and Virtue differ but in name;
 To prove that chains and freedom are but one,
 That to be sav'd must mean to be undone.
 Is there not Guthrie? Who, like him, can call
 All opposites to proof, and conquer all?
 He calls forth living waters from the rock;
 He calls forth children from the barren stock;
 He, far beyond the springs of Nature led,
 Makes women bring forth after they are dead;
 He, on a curious, new, and happy plan,
 In wedlock's sacred bands joins man to man;
 And, to complete the whole, most strange but
     true,

By some rare magic makes them fruitful too;
 Whilst from their loins, in the due course of years,
 Flows the rich blood of Guthrie's English Peers.

Dost thou contrive some blacker deed of shame,
 Something which Nature shudders but to name,
 Something which makes the soul of man retreat,
 And the life-blood run backward to her seat;
 Dost thou contrive, for some base private end,
 Some selfish view, to hang a trusting friend,
 To lure him on, e'en to his parting breath,
 And promise life to work him surer death;
 Grown old in villany, and dead to grace,
 Hell in his heart, and Tyburn in his face,
 Behold a Parson at thy elbow stands,
 Luring damnation, and with open hands,
 Ripe to betray his Saviour for reward,
 The atheist Chaplain of an atheist Lord!

Bred to the Church, and for the gown decreed
 Ere it was known that I should learn to read;
 (Tho' that was nothing, for my friends who knew
 What mighty Dulness of itself could do,
 Never design'd me for a working Priest,
 But hop'd I should have been a Dean at least;)
 Condemn'd (like many more, and worthier men,
 To whom I pledge the service of my pen), Condemn'd (whilst proud and pamper'd Sons of Lawn,
 Cramm'd to the throat, in lazy plenty yawn)
 In pomp of rev'rend begg'ry to appear,
 To pray and starve on forty pounds a year;
 My friends, who never felt the galling load,
 Lament that I forsook the packhorse-road;

Whilst Virtue to my conduct witness bears,
 In throwing off that gown which Francis wears.

What creature's that, so very pert and prim;
 So very full of foppery and whim;
 So gentle, yet so brisk; so wondrous sweet,
 So fit to prattle at a lady's feet;
 Who looks as he the Lord's rich vineyard trod,
 And by his garb appears a man of God?
 Trust not to looks, nor credit outward show;
 The villain lurks beneath the cassock'd Beau;
 That's an Informer; what avails the name?
 Suffice it, that the wretch from Sodom came.

His tongue is deadly—from his presence run,
 Unless thy rage would wish to be undone.
 No ties can hold him, no affection bind,
 And Fear alone restrains his coward mind.
 Free him from that, no monster is so fell,
 Nor is so sure a blood-hound found in hell.
 His silken smiles, his hypocritic air,
 His meek demeanour, plausible and fair,
 Are only worn to pave Fraud's easier way,
 And make gull'd Virtue fall a surer prey.
 Attend his church—his plan of doctrine view,
 The Preacher is a Christian, dull but true:
 But when the hallow'd hour of preaching's o'er,
 The plan of doctrine's never thought of more;
 Christ is laid by, neglected on the shelf,
 And the vile priest is Gospel to himself.

By Cleland tutor'd, and with Blacow bred, (Blacow, whom, by a brave resentment led,
 Oxford, if Oxford had not sunk in fame,
 Ere this had damn'd to everlasting shame)
 Their steps he follows, and their crimes partakes:

To Virtue lost, to Vice alone he wakes;
 Most lusciously declaims 'gainst luscious themes,
 And, whilst he rails at blasphemy, blasphemes.

Are these the arts which Policy supplies?
 Are these the steps by which grave Churchmen rise?

Forbid it Heav'n! or, should it turn out so,
 Let me, and mine, continue mean and low:
 Such be their arts whom Interest controls;
 Kidgell and I have free and honest souls:
 We scorn preferment which is gain'd by sin,
 And will, though poor without, have peace within.

§ 260. A poor Woman attending in the Field of Battle sees her only Son slain, and expresses her Feelings in the following Lamentation.

NAMELESS sons of want and sorrow,
 Few and evil were your days;
 To-day the cowslip buds, to-morrow
     Low the sithe the cowslip lays!
 Men and brethren still I hail ye,
 Though in hostile bands ye be;
 Men and brethren, I bewail ye
     With a tear of sympathy!

Yes, ye all were born of woman,
 Suck'd a tender mother's breast;
 Hark! she cries, O! sword inhuman,
 Spare my child! I'm sore distressed.

Me! me!—kill me! me, who bore him!
Spare the babe this bosom fed!
Ruffians from my cottage tore him,
Where he earn'd my daily bread.

Warrior, here, with rage unfeeling,
Here behold my white breast bare;
Dye it red, and plunge your steel in,
But my child, poor stripling, spare.

My age's solace!—for his father
Perish'd in the bloody field;
A babe he left me, which I'd rather Than the gold the Indies yield.

Pledge of his love;—and I did dearly
Love the father, in the child;
Slay us both, I beg sincerely;
On us both the earth be pil'd.

They sink; but lo! a wondrous vision,
Cloud-clad ghosts unnumber'd rise;
Pale wan looks, that speak contrition;
Blood-stain'd cheeks and hollow eyes.

More in number than the ocean
Rolls the pebbles on its shore,
See they come! and lo! a motion
From a hand all red with gore!

“Listen, listen, sons of sorrow,
Few and evil were your days;
To-day the cowslip buds, to-morrow
Low the sithe the cowslip lays.

We, like you, O! heed our warning,
Warriors were, all blithe and gay;
But we fell in life's bright morning,
Ere we knew the joys of day.

Sons of men, all doom'd to trouble,
Travelling quickly to the grave,
Sheath the sword, for fame's a bubble;
Live to bless, O live to save!

Life to be enjoy'd was given:
Such the will of him above;
Live and love, make earth a heaven,
God made men to live and love!

Hark! the skies with music ringing,
Silver sounds the concave fill;
Angels' voices sweetly singing,
“Peace on Earth, to men good-will.”

§ 261. Written on Occasion of a Ball, in which the Ladies agreed to dress in Silks, for the sake of encouraging the Spitalfields Manufacturers.

WEAVE the web of brightest blue,
Azure as its native sky;
Flow'rets add of ev'ry hue,
’Tis the vest of Charity.

Rich the tissue of the loom,
Glossy gleams the artist's dye;
Yet the mantle shall assume Brighter tints from Charity.

Youth and beauty, lo! advance,
Light and gay as Love can be,
Nimbly tripping in the dance,
Clad in robes of Charity.

Babes and mothers lift the head,
Silk-clad trains of nymphs to see;
Beauty deals them daily bread,
Deck'd in silks of Charity.

Shiv'ring with the winter's wind,
Age, disease, and infancy,
In warm wool their cold limbs bind;
Silk's the dress of Charity.

Lovely ladies at the ball,
Lovelier still if that can be,
Rob'd in silk, in Pleasure's hall,
Dance the dance of Charity.

§ 262. On the late Queen of France.

If thy breast soft pity knows,
O! drop a tear with me;
Feel for the unexampled woes
Of widow'd royalty.

Fallen, fallen from a throne!
Lo! beauty, grandeur, power;
Hark! 'tis a queen's, a mother's moan,
From yonder dismal tower.

I hear her say, or seem to say,
“Ye who listen to my story,
Learn how transient beauty's day,
How unstable human glory.

And when ye hear that I was frail,
O! think what now I bear:
Heed not the page of scandal's tale,
But blot it with a tear.”

§ 263. Verses, by DR. GLYNN.

TEAZE me no more, nor think I care
Though monarchs bow at Kitty's shrine,
Or powder'd coxcombs woo the fair,
Since Kitty is no longer mine.

Indifferent 'tis alike to me,
If my favorite dove be stole,
Whether its dainty feathers be
Pluck'd by the eagle or the owl.

If not for me its blushing lips
The rose-bud opens, what care I
Who the od'rous liquid sips;
The king of bees, or butterfly?

Like me, the Indians of Peru,
Rich in mines of golden ore,
Dejected, see the merchant's crew
Transport it to a foreign shore.

Seeks the slave despoil'd, to know,
Whether his gold in shape of lace
Shine on the coat of birth-day beau,
Or wear the stamp of George's face?

§ 264. Hohenlinden; the Scene of a dreadful Engagement between the French and Imperialists, in which the former conquered. By T. CAMPBELL, Esq.

ON Linden, when the sun was low,
All bloodless lay the untrodden snow;
And dark as winter was the flow
Of Iser rolling rapidly:

But Linden show'd another sight,
When the drum beat at dead of night,
Commanding fires of death, to light
The darkness of the scenery.

By torch and trumpet fast array'd,
Each horseman drew his battle-blade,
And furious every charger neigh'd
To join the dreadful revelry :

Then shook the hills by thunder riven ;
Then flew the steed to battle driven ;
And rolling like the bolts of heaven,
Far flash'd their red artillery.

But redder yet their fires shall glow
On Linden's heights of crimson'd snow ;
And bloodier still the torrent flow
Of Iser rolling rapidly.

The combat deepens ! on, ye brave,
Who rush to glory, or the grave !
Wave, Munich, all thy banners wave,
And charge with all thy chivalry.

'Tis morn ;—but scarce yon level sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun,
Where fiery Frank and furious Hun
Shout in their sulphury canopy.

Few, few shall part where many meet ;
The snow shall be their winding-sheet ;
And every sod beneath their feet
Shall be a soldier's sepulchre.

§ 265. A British War-Song.

QUIT the plough, the loom, the mine ;
Quit the joys the heart entwine !
Join our brothers on the brine ;
Arm, ye brave,—or slavery !

Peace, so lov'd, away is fled ;
War shall leave his iron bed ;
To your arms, avengers dread !
Strike, oh strike at tyranny.

For our homes, our all, our name !
Blast again the tyrant's aim ;
Britain's wrongs swift vengeance claim ;
Rush to arms—or slavery.

Lo ! the shades of Britons proud !
Hear them in yon flitting cloud !
“Freedom, children, or a shroud,”
Choose with British bravery.

Heroes of the sea, the shore,
Quit your laurell'd rest once more ;
Dreadly rouse the battle's roar,
Vengeance hurl on tyranny !

§ 266. The Lotos of Egypt; a Poem. By the Rev. T. MAURICE.

EMBLEM sublime of that primordial power,
That brooded o'er the vast chaotic wave,
Accept my duteous homage, holy flower,
As in thy favorite flood my limbs I lave.

From Æthiopia's lofty mountains roll'd,
Where Nile's proud stream through glad-den'd Egypt pours,
In raptur'd strains thy praise was hymn'd of old,
And still resounds on Ganges' faithful shores !

Within thy beauteous coral's full-blown bell
Long since the immortals fix'd their fond
abode ;

There day's bright source, Osiris, lov'd to dwell,
While by his side enamour'd Isis glow'd,

Hence, not unconscious, to his orient beam
At dawn's first blush thy radiant petals spread,
Drink deep the effulgence of the solar stream,
And, as he mounts, still brighter glories
shed.

When at the noon-tide height his fervid rays
In a bright deluge burst on Cairo's spires,
With what new lustre then thy beauties blaze,
Full of the God, and radiant with his fires !

Brilliant thyself, in store of dazzling white
Thy sister-plants more gaudy robes unfold ;
This flames in purple—that, intensely bright,
Amid th' illumin'd waters burns in gold.

To brave the tropic's fiery beam is thine,
Till in the distant west his splendors fade ;
Then too thy beauty and thy fire decline,
With morn to rise in lovelier charms array'd.

Thus from Arabia borne, on golden wings,
The Phoenix on the sun's bright altar dies ;
But from his flaming bed, refulgent, springs,
And cleaves, with bolder plume, the sapphire
skies.

What mystic treasures in thy form conceal'd
Perpetual transport to the sage supply ;
Where Nature, in her deep designs reveal'd,
Awes wondering man, and charms th' exploring eye !

In thy prolific cup and fertile seeds,
Are trac'd her grand regenerative powers ;
Life springing warm from loath'd putrescence breeds,
And lovelier germs shoot forth and brighter
flowers.

Nor food to the enlighten'd mind alone,
Substantial nutriment thy root bestow'd ;
In famine's vulture-fangs did Egypt groan,
From thy rich bounteous horn abundance
flow'd.

Hence the immortal race in Thebes rever'd,
Thy praise the theme of endless rapture made,
Thy image on a hundred columns rear'd,
And veil'd their altars with thine hallow'd
shade.

But far beyond the bounds of Afric borne,
Thy honors flourish'd 'mid Thibetian snows ;
Thy flowers the Lama's gilded shrine adorn,
And Boodh and Bramah on thy stalk repose.

Where'er fair Science dawn'd on Asia's shore,
Where'er her hallow'd voice Devotion rais'd,
We see thee graven on the golden ore,
And on a thousand sparkling gems emblaz'd.

Child of the sun, why droops thy withering head,
 While high in Leo flames thy radiant sire?
 With Egypt's glory is thy glory fled,
 And with her genius quench'd thy native fire?
 For, direr than her desert's burning wind,
 Gaul's furious legions sweep yon ravag'd vale;
 Death stalks before, grim Famine howls behind,
 And screams of horror load the tainted gale.
 Nile's crimson'd waves with blood polluted roll;
 Her groves, her fanes, devouring fire consumes;
 But mark, slow-rising near the distant pole,
 A sudden splendor all her shores illumines.
 Fatal to Gaul, 'tis Britain's rising star,
 That in the south the bright ascendant gains,
 Resplendent as her Sirius shines from far,
 And with new fervors fires the Libyan plains.
 A race as Egypt's ancient warriors brave,
 For her insulted sons indignant glows;
 Defies the tropic storm, the faithless wave,
 And hurls destruction on their haughty foes.
 Exulting to his source old Nilus hears
 The deep'ning thunders of the British line:
 Again its lovely head the Lotos rears,
 Again the fields in rainbow glories shine.
 Still wider, beauteous plant! thy leaves extend,
 Nor dread the eye of an admiring muse;
 In union with the rising song ascend,
 Spread all thy charms, and-all thy sweets diffuse.
 Of that bold race beneath the Pleiads born,
 To chant thy praise a northern bard aspires;
 Nor with more ardor erst at early dawn
 The Theban artists smote their votive lyres.
 For, oh! can climes th' excursive genius bound?
 No—'mid Siberia bursts the heav'n-taught strain,
 At either pole the Muse's songs resound,
 And snows descend and whirlwinds rage in vain.
 Four thousand summers have thy pride survey'd,
 Thy Pharaohs moulder in their marble tombs;
 Oblivion's wings the pyramids shall shade,
 But thy fair family unfading blooms!
 Still 'mid these ruin'd tow'rs admir'd, rever'd,
 Wave high thy foliage, and secure expand;
 These vast but crumbling piles by man were rear'd;
 But thou wert form'd by an immortal hand!
 With Nature's charms alone thy charms shall fade;
 With Being's self thy beauteous tribe decline;
 Oh! living, may thy flow'rs my temple shade,
 And decorate when dead my envied shrine!

§ 267. Alonzo the Brave and the Fair Imogene.
 M. G. LEWIS, Esq.

A WARRIOR so bold, and a virgin so bright,
 Convers'd as they sat on the green:
 They gaz'd on each other with tender delight,
 Alonzo the Brave was the name of the knight,
 The maid was the Fair Imogene.

"And ah!" said the youth, "since to-morrow
 I go,
 To fight in a far-distant land,
 Your tears for my absence soon ceasing to flow,
 Some other will court you, and you will bestow
 On a wealthier suitor your hand."

"Oh, hush these suspicions," fair Imogene said,
 "So hurtful to love and to me;
 For if you be living, or if you be dead,
 I swear by the Virgin that none in your stead Shall husband of Imogene be."

"And if e'er for another my heart should decide,
 Forgetting Alonzo the Brave,
 God grant that to punish my falsehood and pride,
 Thy ghost at my marriage may sit by my side,
 May tax me with perjury, claim me as bride,
 And bear me away to the grave."

To Palestine hasten'd the warrior so bold,
 His love she lamented him sore;
 But scarce had a twelvemonth elaps'd, when behold,
 A baron, all cover'd with jewels and gold,
 Arriv'd at fair Imogene's door.

His treasure, his presents, his spacious domain,
 Soon made her untrue to her vows,
 He dazzled her eyes, he bewilder'd her brain,
 He caught her affections, so light and so vain,
 And carried her home as his spouse.

And now had the marriage been blest by the priest,
 The revelry now was begun;
 The tables they groan'd with the weight of the feast,

Nor yet had the laughter and merriment ceas'd,
 When the bell of the castle toll'd—ONE!

'Twas then with amazement fair Imogene found
 A stranger was placed by her side;
 His air was terrific, he utter'd no sound,
 He spoke not, he mov'd not, he look'd not around,

But earnestly gaz'd on the bride.

His vizor was clos'd, and gigantic his height,
 His armor was sable to view;
 All laughter and pleasure were hush'd at his sight, [affright,
 The dogs as they eyed him drew back with
 And the lights in the chamber burnt blue.

His presence all bosoms appear'd to dismay,
 The guests sat in silence and fear;
 At length spoke the bride, while she trembled
 —"I pray,

Sir knight, that your helmet aside you would lay,
 And deign to partake of our cheer."

The lady is silent—the stranger complies,
 And his vizor he slowly unclos'd.
 Oh gods! what a sight met fair Imogene's eyes,
 What words can express her dismay and surprise,
 When a skeleton's head was expos'd!

All present then utter'd a terrified shout,
 And turn'd with disgust from the scene;
 The worms they crept in, and the worms they crept out,
 And sported his eyes and his temples about,
 While the spectre address'd Imogene:

"Behold me, thou false one! behold me!" he cried,
 "Behold thy Alonzo the Brave.
 God grants that, to punish thy falsehood and pride,
 My ghost at thy marriage should sit by thy side,
 Should tax thee with perjury, claim thee as bride,
 And bear thee away to the grave."

This saying, his arms round the lady he wound,
 While fair Imogene shriek'd with dismay;
 Then sunk with his prey through the wide-yawning ground,
 Nor ever again was fair Imogene found,
 Or the spectre that bore her away.

Not long liv'd the baron, and none since that
 To inhabit the castle presume: [time
 For chronicles tell, that by order sublime,
 There Imogene suffers the pains of her crime,
 And mourns her deplorable doom.

At midnight four times in each year does her
 sprite,

When mortals in slumber are bound,
 Array'd in her bridal apparel of white,
 Appear in the hall with the skeleton knight,
 And shriek as he whirls her around.

While they drink out of skulls newly torn from the grave,

Dancing round them pale spectres are seen:
 Their liquor is blood, and this horrible stave
 They howl: "To the health of Alonzo the Brave,
 And his consort, the false Imogene."

§ 268. Sonnet. BOWLES.

WHOSE was that gentle voice, that whispering sweet,
 Promis'd, methought, long days of bliss sincere?
 Soothing it stole on my deluded ear,
 Most like soft music that might sometimes cheat
 Thoughts dark and drooping. 'Twas the voice of Hope.

Of love and social scenes it seem'd to speak,
 Of truth, of friendship, of affection meek;
 That hand in hand along life's downward slope

Might walk with peace, and cheer the tranquil hours:

Ah me! the prospect sadden'd as she sung;
 Loud on my startled ear the death-bell rung:
 Chill darkness wrapt the pleasurable bowers
 She built—whilst pointing to yon breathless
 clay, [away!"]

She cried, "No peace be thine: away,

§ 269. Sonnet. BOWLES.

As o'er these hills I take my silent rounds,
 Still on that vision which is flown I dwell!

On images I lov'd, (alas, how well!)
 Now past, and but remember'd like sweet sound
 Of yesterday! yet in my breast I keep Such recollections, painful though they seem;
 And hours of joy retrace, till from my dream
 I wake, and find them not: then I could weep

To think that time so soon each sweet devours,
 To think so soon life's first endearments fail,
 And we are duped by Hope's amusive tale;
 Who like a flatterer, when the happiest hours
 Are past, and most we wish her cheering lay,
 Will fly as faithless and as fleet as they!

§ 270. Sonnet. At a Convent. BOWLES.

If chance some pensive stranger hither led,
 His bosom glowing from majestic views,
 The gorgeous dome, or the proud landscape-
 hues,

Should ask who sleeps beneath this lonely bed,
 'Tis poor Matilda! To the cloister'd scene,
 A mourner beauteous and unknown, she came,
 To shed her tears unmark'd, and quench the
 flame

Of ruthless love: yet still her look serene
 As the pale moonlight in the midnight aisle.
 Her voice was soft, which yet a charm could lend

Like that which spoke of a departed friend,
 And a meek sadness sat upon her smile!—
 Be the rude spot by passing pity blest,
 Where, hush'd to long repose, the wretched
 rest.

§ 271. Sonnet. BOWLES.

O TIME, thou know'st a lenient hand to lay Softest on sorrow's wounds, and slowly thence (Lulling to sad repose the weary sense)
 The faint pang stealest unperceiv'd away;
 On thee I rest my only hope at last,
 And think, when thou hast dried the bitter tear
 That flows in vain o'er all my soul held dear,
 I may look back on ev'ry sorrow past,
 And meet life's peaceful evening with a smile—
 As some lone bird at day's departing hour
 Sings in the sunbeam of the transient show'r,
 Forgetful though its wings are wet the while;
 Yet ah! how much must that poor heart endure,
 Which hopes from thee, and thee alone,
 a cure!

§ 272. The Tunbridge School Boy. Spoken by Mr. THOMAS KNOX at the annual Visitation of Tunbridge School.

SWEET is thy month, O Maia! nor less sweet
 Life's earliest prime, when roseate blossoms blow
 In Fancy's fairy meads, the Elysian fields
 Of infantine illusion, on the breast
 Of boys, who court, like us, the classic Muse,
 And daily sip the dews of Castalie.

Happy the school-boy! did he prize his bliss,
 'Twere ill exchang'd for all the dazzling gems
 That gaily sparkle in ambition's eye;
 His are the joys of nature, his the smile,
 The cherub smile, of innocence and health,
 Sorrow unknown, or if a tear be shed,
 He wipes it soon; for hark! the cheerful voice
 Of comrades calls him to the top, or ball.
 Away he hies, and clamors as he goes

With glee, which causes him to tread on air ;
Bounding along elastic to the field,
Or play-ground, scarce the well-stuff'd leathern
orb

Springs from the earth so light, so swift as he :
And well he earns the sport he well enjoys,
For from the morning's dawn o'er learning's
His steady eye has por'd till eventide. [page

Early he woke ; and scarce had chanticleer
Announc'd Aurora's orient blushing beams,
When from the turret of the classic dome
The bell importunate rang shrill and loud,
And call'd him from his pillow ; up he sprang,
Shaking soft slumbers from his shining eyes,
And eager to renew his daily task.

First lowly on his knees with orisons
His Father high in heaven he supplicates
To bless his earthly sire, her that bore him,
Friends, tutors, all that watch with anxious care
To guide his footsteps in the paths of peace :
Then to the limpid spring he hies, and laves
In the cold element his morning face.

His flowing locks well kempt, all neat and fresh
As vernal violets wash'd with drops of dew,
He takes his seat upon the classic bench,
With Lily's volume duly op'd before him,
And cons the task to memory assign'd,
Repeating rules of grammar o'er and o'er
With patience unsubdued ; but now and then
He sweetens toil with gingerbread's nice cates,
Or apples par'd unseen beneath the form,
Or conversation softly interchang'd
Of nests, and slides, and marbles, weighty cares,
Yet not unpleasing. Soon the busy school
Glow with a general hum, as when in May
The bees go forth to rifle honey'd flowers,
They buz and murmur, yet no labor slight,
But bring home luscious loads to enrich the hive.

The morning part well said, new cares succeed ;

For now the authors of a golden age,
Virgil and Horace, Tully's copious page,
And Homer's manly melody, invite
The ear attun'd by nature and by art,
To revel in the luxury of verse,
Or prose well measur'd, fraught with sense and
sound

Harmonious ; polish'd is his ear, and keen
His intellect, he hears, he tastes, he feels,
Till his whole soul elate with ecstasy,
Catching the flame of genius, boldly dares
To emulate the beauty he admires :
Hence in the evening exercise the theme
Pregnant with moral truth, express'd in style
Purely Augustan ; one day sure to grace
The bar, the pulpit, or the author's page,
Himself to aggrandize, and serve mankind.
Nor seldom does the stripling snatch the lyre,
And strike the deep-ton'd shell. Alcæus now
He emulates ; whose sinewy nervous lines
Pour forth, like Handel's strains, full harmony ;
And now he sings with Sappho softly sweet ;
The liquid measures flow like honey'd drops
That trickle from the dædal cells of bees,
Adonis closing the mellifluent lay
With gentlest cadence. Listen yet once more !
'Tis elegy I hear ; the mournful verse

Is simple ; yet 'tis nature's voice, and comes
Directly from the heart ;—and to the heart
It deeply pierces ; I could weep, and smile
To think I wept—how plaintive are the notes !
Like such as oft I hear the nightingale
Modestly warble from the thickest shade,
Concealment seeking, yet betray'd by tones
Softer and sweeter than Italia's sons
Strain from their throats to raptur'd theatres.
But not to ode and elegy alone

His ardor leads ; his emulative skill
In epigram he tries ; and many a point
Inserts which Martial might not blush to own,
With classical expression neat and terse.
Oft on the banks of Medway, near the dome
Of Sydney's noble race, he sits reclin'd,
And meditates the verse where Waller sat
And sung his Sacharissa ; by his side
Horace and Ovid. While the trembling reed
With fly appendant lures the golden chub,
His pencil in his hand, he studious notes
Some bright idea, or some polish'd phrase
Suggested by the Muse that haunts the groves
Of Penshurst, classic ground : if Britain's isle
Can boast such ground, then Penshurst's is the claim,

[scream
Though solitude now reigns, and the heron's
Drowns with the din each song of Philomel.

The task well finish'd, to the master's eye
The stripling bard submits with anxious heart,
Happy, thrice happy could it meet with praise.
His bosom throbs, till soon the judge's brows,
That frown'd terrific, gentler looks assume :
He calls the urchin with a friendly voice,
And stroking his curl'd locks, "'Tis good,"
he cries,

"And to reward thy well-done task I grant
A holiday." Straight all the air resounds
"A holiday !" loud shouts from infant lips
Proclaim a holiday ! they eager rush
To snatch the licens'd joy ; each moment lost
Seems like an hour. Then take, O take your fill,
Ye innocent tribes, nor let severity
Too rigorous rob you of the fleeting day :
'Tis brief at best, and hardly shall ye know
In life's most boasted years a purer bliss
Or more exalted. Fly then o'er the lawn,
Climb yonder hill—expatiate through the grove,
Or from the green bank plunge into the wave.
Why need I urge ? already they are gone ;
Some in the limpid stream already merg'd,
Their pastime take, and cleave the ambient
Or buoyant on the surface float supine, [wave,
Sporting like halcyons on the smooth expanse.
Thus nerv'd with added strength they urge the ball

At cricket, manly game ! the boast of Kent,
Tunbrigia's sons against all England's race ;
Nor last, though least, the sprightly boys of Judd*,
Scorning to be surpass'd in school, or field.

Others, as seasons urge, with wary eye
Search every thicket for the mossy nest ;
And, thoughtless of the wrong, the eggs despoil,
Blue as the ethereal concave, streak'd or vein'd
By nature's pencil with a thousand dyes.

* Sir Arthur Judd, the founder.

Oh! my companions! rob not the poor bird,
For many a pang she feels; but be content
With viewing the fair prize, and leave it there.
Sweetly the song from yonder hawthorn bush
Shall pay your generous pity as you pass;
And conscious virtue shall a bliss bestow,
Which rapine, though successful, never tastes,
Though India's gems enrich the plunderer.

Trust not in wrong and robbery for happiness;

Nor, when autumnal suns the pensile fruit
Mature and on the southern garden-wall
Blushes the nectar'd peach like Hebe's cheek,
O'erleap the fence. Oh, turn thy roving eye
From orchards rich with vegetable gold,
The pippin and the pear; and learn, like me,
The ripen'd cherry, shining, sleek, and plump,
To view with all the stoic's apathy.

I hate the purple cluster of the grape
When, out of reach, it peeps between the leaves
Half shown and half conceal'd, to tempt the more.

Insidious beauty! Comrade, touch it not:
If e'er in evil hour thou pluck the fruit
Unlawful, thou shalt rue it, short-liv'd sweet Follow'd by bitterness. The owner sees
Unseen, and tells the master of thy theft.
Then lo, the birchen fasces—hateful twigs;
Down go the galligaskins; sighs and sobs
Too plainly tell what penalties and woes
Brings disobedience, and the tempting fruit
Of that forbidden tree. Then learn content:
A little weekly stipend is thine own,
And freely use it, as it was given for use.
Does thy mouth water? See the matron's stall,
Plums, nuts, and apples, rang'd in shining rows,

Invite, nor rigid Prudence bids forbear;
There purchase, paying ready cash, and eat,
Welcome as nuts to thee thy mite to her.
Enjoy thy feast, poor imp, and freely taste,
No fears or qualms empoisoning the regale;
Then, with light heart, and pockets lighter still,
Eas'd of thy money—root of every harm!
Away again to drive the circling hoop,
Or spin the top, or knuckle down at taw.

But now the shades of eve and turret bell
Proclaim the holiday too soon expir'd—
“In boys! all in, boys!” Instant to the school
Repairing, low they bend to that high Pow'r
That guards them from the sultry noon-tide heat,

The pestilence that walketh in the night,
And out of mouths of sucklings and of babes
Ordained praise. The choral hymn and pray'r
Ascends like incense to the throne of heaven.

And now all weary, and with eyes half-clos'd,
Down on the couch they sink, nor sooner down,

Than sleep seals up their lids: how hush'd the din,

The merry noise that echoed o'er the field
The live long day! 'Tis silent all and still
Along the chambers of the dormitory,
Save where a gentle breathing soothes the ear,
Or now and then a voice that talks in sleep:
For many a vision, or fantastic dream,

Hovers around their pillows; rivers, groves,
Bird's-nests on tops of tallest trees are seen,
With callow young, or eggs of varied hue;
Goldfinches, larks, or linnets, lim'd with twigs,
Or snar'd in traps, or gudgeons on the hook.
The orchard's charms with added lures appear:
Already up the tree they seize the prize;
There plums and pippins, pears of freshest hue,
Clusters of grapes, no longer out of reach,
Distil nectareous juices on their lips,
Which seem to smack again: so strong and true

Imagination's pencil paints the scene.
Thus cheer'd by slumbers and a holiday,
With double diligence they ply the task
Upon the morrow: then vacation's good,
When to ingenuous minds allow'd it gives
A spur to industry, and to genius fire.

Rest and alternate labour, these combin'd
With discipline, shall form the emulous youth
To high accomplishments in liberal arts;
And when his friends and country call him forth
To generous services in busy life,
With energetic force he acts his part,
And strict propriety, in every place,
However arduous, in the social sphere.
Happy and honor'd, prominent he stands
Among the sons of men; and lustre flings
Back on the place where education stored
His mind with arts that taught him to excel.

Pardon my daring, if amid this group
Of school-boys, who, beneath your fostering smiles,

The muses, graces, virtues, cultivate,
I venture to foretell that, spurning ease,
Some shall emerge, and add to the renown
Of Tunbridge school; an ancient hoary seat
Of classic institution, favour'd long
By patronage of men whose liberal souls,
Amid the cares of gain, commercial toils,
Chief cause of Britain's proud pre-eminence,
Still find an hour to listen to the muse,
And honor arts which seek no sordid pelf,
But add a grace to life, and build up man.

O 'tis a noble edifice; and here
The solid basis must be firmly laid
In elemental lore. The pious Judd
Some centuries past here plac'd the corner-stone:
His sons, disdaining to degenerate,
Support and deck the pile. 'Tis nobly done,
And merits praise, which, though our hearts
can feel, [due.

Our tongues want words to speak in language

A school-boy!—you've heard my artless tale;
'Tis a true picture of my simple life;
Then how should I in language adequate
Describe your merits? 'Tis a copious theme,
And asks a genius, as your bounty large.
But this I know, instructed in the arts
Of elegance and taste beneath this roof,
And cherish'd by your smiles, the day may come

When I may strike the lyre with manly grace,
And justify the favour which e'en now
Indulgence, blinding judgement, has bestow'd.

Tunbridge, May 9, 1802.

EPIGRAMS, EPITAPHS, AND OTHER LITTLE PIECES.

On a very rich Gentleman drinking the Waters of Tunbridge Wells, who had refused to contribute to the Relief of a distress'd Family.

FOR deepest woes old Harpax scorns to feel;
Think ye his bowels stand in need of steel?

The Art of making one's own Sermons, illustrated by Example.

JACK stole his discourse from the fam'd
Doctor Brown,
But reading it wretchedly made it his own.

Know Thyself.

FITZ to the Peerage knows he's a disgrace;
So mounts the coach-box as his proper place.

WHILE Dick to combs hostility proclaims,
A neighbouring taper sets his hair in flames:
The blaze extinct, permit us to inquire,
"Were there no lives lost, Richard, in the fire?"

AVERSE to pamper'd and high-mettled steeds,
His own upon chopp'd straw Avaro feeds:
Bred in his stable, in his paddock born,
What vast ideas they must have of corn!

A Case of Conscience; submitted to a late Dignitary of the Church, on his Narcotic Exposition of the following Text: "Watch and Pray, lest ye enter into Temptation."

BY our pastor perplexed,
How shall we determine?
"Watch and pray," says the Text,
"Go to sleep," says the Sermon.

On a Lady who squinted.

IF ancient poets Argus prize
Who boasted of a hundred eyes,
Sure greater praise to her is due
Who looks a hundred ways with two!

As Will along the floor had laid
His lazy limbs in solemn show,
"You're ill," quoth Sal, "I'm sore afraid."
"Indeed," says Will, "I'm rather low."

To a Lady, with a Print of Venus attired by the Graces.

THAT far superior is thy state
Even envy must agree;
On thee a thousand Graces wait,
On Venus only three.

To a Gentleman who was obliged to retreat for fear of a disagreeable Retaliation.

THAT Cotta is so pale, so spare,
No cause for wonder now affords;
He lives, alas! on empty fare,
Who lives by eating his own words.

On the Dutchess of Devonshire.

ARRAY'D in matchless beauty, Devon's fair
In Fox's favor takes a zealous part:
But, oh! where'er the pilferer comes—beware!
She supplicates a vote, and steals a heart.

On the Phrase, "Killing Time." Translated from Voltaire.

"THERE's scarce a point wherein mankind
agree,
So well as in their boast of killing me.
I boast of nothing: but, when I've a mind,
I think I can be even with mankind."

"BROTHER bucks, your glasses drain:
Tom, 'tis strong and sparkling red."
"Never fear—'twon't reach my brain."
"No—that's true—but 'twill your head."

THE gay Flirtilla show'd her mimic bust,
And ask'd blunt Senso if 'twere fashion'd just.
"Ma'am," he replied, "in this 'tis much like
you;
The face is painted, and that badly too."

An Expostulation.

WHEN late I attempted your pity to move,
Why seem'd you so deaf to my prayers?
Perhaps it was right to dissemble your love—
But—why did you kick me down stairs?

Epitaph.

HERE is my much-lov'd Celia laid,
At rest from all her earthly labors!
Glory to God, peace to the dead,
And to the ears of all her neighbours.

A DOCTOR there is of so humble a grace,
That the case he durst never express :
But little he says, and if that you will trace,
His knowledge you'll find to be less.

Then sure you will say he's deficient in brain ;
Or his head to a still you'll compare,
That does little or nothing but simples contain,
And yields them by drops that are rare.

A Distich written by Mr. Cowper, at the Request of a Gentleman who importuned him to write something in his Pocket Album.

I WERE indeed indifferent to fame,
Grudging two lines t' immortalize my name.

An old Gentleman of the name of Page, finding a Lady's Glove, sent it to the Owner, with this Distich, and received the following Answer.

IF that from Glove you take the letter G,
Then Glove is love, and that I send to thee.

ANSWER.

IF that from Page you take the letter P,
Then Page is age, and that won't do for me.

On his Excellency the late Lord Galloway and his Cook.

SAYS my Lord to his cook, " You son of a punk,
How comes it I see you, thus, ev'ry day drunk ?
Physicians, they say, once a month do allow
A man, for his health, to get drunk as a sow."
" That is right," quoth the cook, " but the day
they don't say ;
" So for fear I should miss it, I'm drunk ev'ry
day."

To an unfortunate Beauty.

SAY, lovely maid, with downcast eye,
And cheek with silent sorrow pale,
What gives thy heart the lengthen'd sigh,
That heaving tells a mournful tale ?

Thy tears, which thus each other chase,
Bespeak a breast o'erwhelm'd with woe ;
Thy sighs, a storm which wrecks thy peace,
Which souls like thine should never know.

Oh ! tell me, doth some favour'd youth,
Too often blest, thy beauties slight ;
And leave those thrones of love and truth,
That lip, and bosom of delight ?

What though to other nymphs he flies,
And feigns the fond, impassion'd tear,
Breathes all the eloquence of sighs
That treach'rous won thy artless ear ?

Let not those nymphs thy anguish move,
For whom his heart may seem to pine !
That heart shall ne'er be blest by love,
Whose guilt can force a pang from thine.

Conscience.

THE Chartreux wants the warning of a bell
To call him to the duties of his cell ;
There needs no noise at all t' awaken sin,
Th' adulterer and thief his 'larum has within.

Lines sent to Mr. Cosway, while Lady C. Paw-let was sitting to him.

COSWAY, my Cath'rine sits to you :
And, that the col'ring may be true,
This nosegay on your pallet place,
Replete with all the tints that grace
The various beauties of her face.
Her skin the snow-drop's whiteness shows,
Her blushing cheek the op'ning rose :
Her eyes the modest violet speak,
Whose silken fringes kiss her cheek.
The spicy pink, in morning dew,
Presents her fragrant lips to view.
The glossy curls that crown her head,
Paint from the gilt-cup of the mead.
Long may her image fill my eye,
When these fair emblems fade and die ;
Placed on my faithful breast, and prove
'Tis Cosway paints the Queen of Love.

On seeing a Dog asleep near his Master.

THRICE happy dog ! thou feel'st no woe,
No anguish to molest
Thy peaceful hours that sweetly flow,
Alternate sport and rest.
Man's call'd thy lord—affliction's heir !
And sorrow's only son !
Whilst he's a slave to ev'ry care,
And thou art slave to none.
Blest, near thy master thus to lie,
And blest with him to rove !
Unstain'd by guilt thy moments fly
On wings of grateful love.

Oh ! that my heart, like thine, could taste
The sweets of guiltless life !
Beyond the reach of passion placed,
Its anguish and its strife.

On a Waiter, once at Arthur's, and a Fellow-servant of his there, both since Members of Parliament, and the last a Nabob.

WHEN Bob M-ck-th, with upper servant's
pride,
" Here, sirrah, clean my shoes," to Rumb—d
cry'd,
He humbly answer'd, " Yea, Bob :"
But since return'd from India's plunder'd land,
The purse-proud Rumb—d now, on such command,
Would stoutly answer, " Nay, Bob."

To rob the nation two contractors come,
One cheats in corn, the other cheats in rum :
The greater rogue 'tis hard to ascertain ;
The rogue in spirits, or the rogue in grain.

Verses written by a Gentleman on finding an Urn.

TRIFLING mortal, tell me why
 Thou hast disturb'd my urn;
 Want'st thou to find out what am I?
 Vain man! attend, and learn:
 To know what letters spelt my name
 Is useless quite to thee;
 A heap of dust is all I am,
 And all that thou shalt be.
 Go now, that heap of dust explore,
 Measure its grains, or weigh;
 Canst thou the title which I bore
 Distinguish in the clay?
 What glitt'ring honors, or high trust,
 Once dignified me here,
 Were characters imprest on dust,
 Which quickly disappear.
 Nor will the sparkling atoms show
 A Claudius or a Guelph:
 Vain search if here the source thou'dst know,
 Of nobles, or thyself.
 The mould will yield no evidence
 By which thou mayst divine
 If lords or beggars issued thence,
 And form'd the ancient line.
 Learn then the vanity of birth;
 Condition, honors, name,
 Are all but modes of common earth,
 The substance just the same.
 Bid av'rice and ambition view
 Th' extent of all their gains;
 Themselves, and their possessions too,
 A gallon vase contains.
 Haste, lift thy thoughts from earthly things
 To more substantial bliss;
 And leave that grov'ling pride to kings,
 Which ends in dirt like this.
 Let virtue be thy radiant guide,
 'Twill dignify thy clay,
 And raise thy ashes glorified,
 When suns shall fade away.

The Negro's Complaint.

WIDE over the tremulous sea
 The moon spread her mantle of light,
 And the gale, gently dying away,
 Breath'd soft on the bosom of night.
 On the fore-castle Maratan stood,
 And pour'd forth his sorrowful tale;
 His tears fell unseen in the flood,
 His sighs pass'd unheard on the gale.
 Ah, wretch! in wild anguish he cry'd,
 From country and liberty torn;
 Ah! Maratan, wouldst thou had died,
 Ere o'er the salt waves thou wert borne!
 Through the groves of Angola I stray'd,
 Love and Hope made my bosom their home,
 There I talk'd with my favourite maid,
 Nor dream'd of the sorrow to come.
 From the thicket the man-hunter sprung,
 My cries echo'd loud through the air;
 There was fury and wrath on his tongue,
 He was deaf to the shrieks of despair.

Accurs'd be the merciless band,
 Who his love could from Maratan tear;
 And blasted this impotent hand,
 That was sever'd from all I held dear.
 Flow, ye tears, down my cheeks ever flow,
 Still let sleep from my eye-lids depart,
 And still may the arrows of woe
 Drink deep of the stream of my heart!
 But hark! on the silence of night
 My Adila's accents I hear,
 And mournful beneath the wan light
 I see her lov'd image appear!
 Slow o'er the smooth ocean she glides,
 As the mist that hangs light on the wave;
 And fondly her lover she chides,
 That lingers so long from the grave.
 "O Maratan, haste thee!" she cries,
 "Here the reign of oppression is o'er,
 The tyrant is robb'd of his prize,
 And Adila sorrows no more."
 Now, sinking amidst the dim ray,
 Her form seems to fade on my view;
 O stay then, my Adila, stay—
 She beckons, and I must pursue.
 To-morrow, the white man in vain
 Shall proudly account me his slave;
 My shackles I plunge in the main,
 And rush to the realms of the brave.

Elegy to the Memory of Miss Louisa Hanway.

O THOU, to whom fair Genius homage paid,
 Whom science courted, and the Muses lov'd:
 Whose mind the hand of Innocence array'd,
 Pure as that form which Envy's self approv'd:
 Accept these tributary drops—these sighs!
 (Remembrance still will on thy virtues dwell) [skies,
 Tho' nought could check thy progress to the
 The soul must cherish hers it lov'd so well.
 For thou wert all ambition could desire,
 Endow'd with all that nature could impart;
 Warm was thy breast with Friendship's sacred
 fire,
 And form'd for sentiment thy gentle heart.
 Near thy blest shade the pensive Muse shall
 stray,
 Led by the pallid moon's uncertain light,
 Sad tribute to thy peerless worth to pay,
 And to thy tomb soft Sympathy invite.
 Lamenting Memory, too, shall linger there,
 And cull sweet flow'rs to deck thy holy shrine:
 For thee indulge the deep-drawn sigh sincere,
 And o'er thy ashes shall with pity pine.
 Yet check'd should be those tears thy friends
 may shed,
 That grief, which thy fond parents' peace destroys;
 For thou art only rank'd amongst the dead,
 To find a passage to eternal joys.

That Power which seal'd th' apparent harsh decree,
Who ev'ry feeling of thy heart could know,
Judg'd what thy pangs from future ills might be,
And snatch'd thee early from a world of woe.

On an unfortunate Beauty. ANON.

POOR wand'rer! how shall that weak form,
So loosely clad in vesture light,
Endure the malice of the storm,
The rudeness of the winter's night?

And does a smile thy cheek illumine?
Alas! that faint and feeble glow
Is like the flower's untimely bloom,
Drooping amidst a waste of snow.

Poor wretch!—you sigh, you would unfold
The course of sorrow you have run:
A simple story, quickly told—
You lov'd, believ'd, and were undone.

Why weep you as my hand you press?
Why on my features gaze and sigh?
Would no one pity your distress?
None listen to your tale, but I?

Alas! a pittance scant, I fear,
Is all the joy I can bestow;
I can but wipe away one tear,
One moment from a life of woe.

Yet e'en for this your grateful eye
To heaven is rais'd—Poor girl, adieu!
To scenes of senseless mirth I fly,
To poverty and sickness you.

By Dr. YOUNG.

As in smooth oil the razor best is whet,
So wit is by politeness sharpest set;
Their want of edge from their offence is seen,
Both pain us least when exquisitely keen.

Advice to Mr. Pope, on his intended Translation of Homer, 1714.

O THOU who, with a happy genius born,
Canst tuneful verse in flowing numbers turn,
Crown'd on thy Windsor's plains with early bays,
Be early wise, nor trust to barren praise.
Blind was the Bard that sung Achilles' rage,
He sung, and begg'd, and curs'd th' ungriving age:
If Britain his translated song would hear,
First take the gold—then charm the list'ning
ear;
So shall thy father Homer smile to see
His pension paid, tho' late—and paid to thee.

Th' inspiring muses, and the god of love,
Which most should grace the fair Melinda
strove.
Love arm'd her with his bow and keenest
darts,
The muses more enrich'd her mind with arts.

Though Greece in shining temples heretofore
Did Venus' and Minerva's pow'rs adore,
The ancients thought no single goddess fit
To reign at once o'er beauty and o'er wit;
Each was a sep'rate claim; till now we find
The different titles in Melinda join'd.

AN opera, like a pill'ry, may be said
To nail our ears down, but expose our head.

LUCIA thinks happiness consists in state;
She weds an idiot, but she eats in plate.

To the Hon. Mrs. Perceval, with Hutcheson's Treatise on Beauty and Order. GRIERSON.

Th' internal senses painted here we see:
They're born in others, but they live in thee.
O! were our author with thy converse blest,
Could he behold the virtues of thy breast;
His needless labors with contempt he'd view,
And bid the world not read—but copy you.

JACK eating rotten cheese, did say,
Like Samson, I my thousands slay:
I vow, quoth Roger, so you do,
And with the self-same weapon too.

On God's Omnipotence.

WHEN Egypt's host God's chosen tribe pursued,
In crystal walls th' admiring waters stood;
When thro' the dreary wastes they took their
way,
The rocks relented, and pour'd forth a sea!
What limits can th' Almighty goodness know,
Since seas can harden, and since rocks can flow!

Simili similis gaudet.

WHEN Chloe's picture was to Chloe shown,
Adorn'd with charms and beauties not her own;
Where Hogarth, pitying nature, kindly made
Such lips, such eyes, as Chloe never had;
Ye Gods! she cries in ecstasy of heart,
How near can nature be express'd by art!
Well! it is wondrous like! nay, let me die,
The very pouting lip, the killing eye!—
Blunt and severe as Manly in the play,
Downright replies: Like, madam, do you say?
The picture bears this likeness, it is true:
The canvas painted is, and so are you.

My sickly spouse with many a sigh
Oft tells me—Billy, I shall die!
I griev'd, but recollected straight
'Tis bootless to contend with fate;
So resignation to Heaven's will
Prepar'd me for succeeding ill.
'Twas well it did; for on my life,
'Twas Heaven's will—to spare my wife.

As Sherlock at Temple was taking a boat,
The waterman ask'd him which way he would float.

Which way? says the Doctor: why, fool, with the stream.—

To Paul's or to Lambeth, 'twas all one to him.

On a Prelate's going out of Church in Time of Divine Service, to wait on the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

LORD PAM in the Church (could you think it?) kneel'd down:

When, told that the duke was just come to town,

His station despising, unaw'd by the place,
He flies from his God to attend on his Grace.
To the court it was fitter to pay his devotion,
Since God had no share in his lordship's promotion.

A HUM'ROUS fellow in a tavern late,
Being drunk and valiant, gets a broken pate:
The surgeon, with his instruments and skill,
Searches his skull deeper and deeper still,
To feel his brains, and try if they were sound;
And, as he keeps ado about the wound,
The fellow cries—Good surgeon, spare your pains:

When I began this brawl I had no brains.

By fav'ring wit Mæcenas purchas'd fame,
Virgil's own works immortaliz'd his name:
A double share of fame is Dorset's due,
At once the patron and the poet too.

POLLIO must needs to penitence excite;
For see, his scarves are rich, and gloves are white.

Behold his notes display'd, his body rais'd:
With what a zeal he labours to be prais'd!
No stubborn sinner able to withstand
The force and reasoning of his wig and band:
Much better pleas'd, so pious his intent,
With five that laugh than fifty who repent.
On moral duties when his tongue refines,
Tully and Plato are his best divines:

What Matthew says, or Mark, the proof but
small;

What Locke or Clarke asserts, good scripture
all.

Touch'd with each weakness which he does arraign,

With vanity he talks against the vain;
With ostentation does to meekness guide,
Proud of his periods levell'd against pride;
Ambitiously the love of glory slights,
And damns the love of fame—for which he writes.

THE Latin word for cold, one ask'd his friend;
It is, said he—'tis at my finger's end.

The World.

THE world's a book, writ by th' eternal art
Of the great Author; printed in man's heart;
'Tis falsely printed, though divinely penn'd;
And all th' errata will appear at th' end.

On the Battle of the Books.

SWIFT for the ancients has argu'd so well,
'Tis apparent from thence that the moderns excel.

A WELSHMAN and an Englishman disputed,
Which of their lands maintain'd the greatest
state;

The Englishman the Welshman quite con-
futed,
The Welshman yet would not his vaunts abate.

Ten cooks, quoth he, in Wales, one wedding sees.

Ah, quoth the other, each man toasts his cheese.

From the Latin.

UNHAPPY, Dido, was thy fate,
In first and second wedded state!
One husband caus'd thy flight by dying,
Thy death the other caus'd by flying.

On the Funeral of Vulture Hopkins.

Who, in his life-time, sav'd a candle's end!

The Humourist. Imitated from Martial.

IN all thy humors, whether grave or mellow,
Thou'rt such a touchy, testy, pleasant fellow,
Hast so much wit, and mirth, and spleen, about
thee,
There is no living with thee, nor without thee.

A HAUGHTY courtier meeting in the streets
A scholar, him thus insolently greets:
Base men to take the wall I ne'er permit.
The scholar said, I do; and gave him it.

THUS with kind words Sir Edward cheer'd his friend:
Dear Dick! thou on my friendship mayst depend:

I know thy fortune is but very scant;
But be assur'd, I'll ne'er see Dick in want.
Dick's soon confin'd—his friend, no doubt,
would free him:
His word he kept—in want he ne'er would see him.

They light a torch to show their shame the

AT Christ-Church Marriage, play'd before the king,
Lest these learn'd mates should want an offering,
The king himself did offer—what, I pray?
He offer'd, twice or thrice, to go away.

*A Country Parson's Answer to a young Lady who sent her Compliments on the Ten of

YOUR compliments, dear lady, pray forbear;
Old English services are more sincere:
You send ten hearts, the tithe is only mine;
Give me but one, and burn the other nine.

I AM unable, yonder beggar cries,
To stand or go. If he says true, he lies.

MOORE always smiles whenever he recites;
He smiles, you think, approving what he writes.
And yet in this no vanity is shown;
A modest man may like what's not his own.

To a Writer of long Epitaphs.

FRIEND, in your Epitaphs I'm griev'd
So very much is said:
One half will never be believ'd,
The other never read.

*To Mr. Thomson, who had procured the Author
a Benefit Night.* DENNIS.

REFLECTING on thy worth, methinks I find
Thy various Seasons in their Author's mind.
Spring opes her blossoms various as thy muse
And, like thy soft compassion, sheds her dews.
Summer's hot drought in thy expression glows,
And o'er each page a tawny ripeness throws.
Autumn's rich fruits th' instructed reader gains,
Who tastes the meaning purpose of thy strains.
Winter—but that no semblance takes from
thee:

That hoary season yields a type of me.
Shatter'd by Time's weak storms I with'ring lay,
Leafless, and whitening in a cold decay!
Yet shall my propless ivy, pale and bent,
Bless the short sunshine which thy pity lent.

The Fan. ATTERBURY.

FLAVIA the least and slightest toy
Can with resistless art employ:
This fan, in meaner hands, would prove
An engine of small force in love:
Yet she, with graceful air and mien,
Not to be told, or safely seen,
Directs its wanton motions so,
That it wounds more than Cupid's bow;
Gives coolness to the matchless dame,
To ev'ry other breast a flame.

To the Author of an Epitaph on Dr. Mead.
HACKETT.

MEAD's not dead then, you say, only sleeping
a little?
Why, egad! Sir, you've hit it off there to a tittle:
Yet, friend, his awaking I very much doubt—Pluto knows whom he's got, and will ne'er let him out.

To Mr. Pope.

WHILE malice, Pope, denies thy page
Its own celestial fire;
While critics and while bards in rage,
Admiring, won't admire:
While wayward pens thy works assail,
And envious tongues decry;
These times though many a friend bewail,
These times bewail not I.
But when the world's loud praise is thine,
And spleen no more shall blame;
When with thy Homer thou shalt shine
In one establish'd fame:
When none shall rail, and ev'ry lay
Devote a wreath to thee:
That day (for come it will)—that day
Shall I lament to see.

British Economy.

IN merry Old England it once was a rule,

For mercy dwells not here.
From cannibals thou fledd'st in vain,
Lawyers less quarter give;
The first won't eat you till you're slain,
The last will do't alive.

On the Bursar of St. John's College in Oxford cutting down a fine Row of Trees.

INDULGENT nature to each kind bestows
A secret instinct to discern its foes:

The goose, a silly bird, avoids the fox :
Lambs fly from wolves, and sailors steer from rocks :

A rogue the gallows as his fate foresees,
And bears the like antipathy to trees.

Good Music and bad Dancers.

How ill the motion with the music suits !
So Orpheus play'd, and like them danc'd the brutes.

YE little wits, that gleam'd a while,
While Pope vouchsafed a ray ;
Alas ! depriv'd of his kind smile,
How soon ye fade away !

To compass Phœbus' car about,
Thus empty vapors rise ;
Each lends his cloud to put him out,
That rear'd him to the skies.

Alas ! these skies are not your sphere ;
There he shall ever burn :
Weep, weep, and fall ; for earth ye were,
And must to earth return.

So much, my Pope, thy English Iliad charms,
As pity melts us, or as passion warms ;
That after-ages shall with wonder seek
Who 'twas translated Homer into Greek.

To Lady Isabella Thynne, cutting Trees in Paper. WALLER.

FAIR hand, that can on virgin paper write,
Yet from the stain of ink preserve it white ;
Whose travel o'er that silver field does show
Like tracks of leverets in morning snow :
Love's image thus in purest minds is wrought,
Without a spot or blemish to the thought.
Strange, that your fingers should the pencil foil,
Without the help of colors or of oil !
For though a painter boughs and leaves can make,
'Tis yours alone to make them bend and shake,
Whose breath salutes your new-created grove
Like southern winds, and makes it gently move.
Orpheus could make the forest dance, but you
Can make the motion and the forest too.
A poet, when he would describe his mind,
Is, as in language, so in fame, confin'd ;
Your works are read wherever there are men :
So far the scissors go beyond the pen.

WHEN old Elijah, as the Scriptures say,
Triumphant mounted to the realms of day,
His spirit doubled, and his cloak beside,
He gave Elisha, by long service tried.
Tristan from hence would fain example take,
For honest Quinault his disciple's sake ;
But this, alas ! injurious fate denied,
For Tristan poorer than a prophet died.
To Quinault thus the bard, expiring, spoke :
" My wit I leave thee—but I have no cloak."

With numbers he the flying nymph pursues,
With numbers such as Phœbus' self might use ;
All, but the nymph who should redress his

He catch'd at love, and fill'd his arms with bays.

As after noon, one summer's day,
Venus stood bathing in a river;
Cupid a-shooting went that way,
New-strung his bow, new-fill'd his quiver.
With skill he chose his sharpest dart;
With all his might his bow he drew:
Swift to his beauteous parent's heart
The too well guided arrow flew.
I faint! I die! the goddess cried:
O cruel! couldst thou find none other
To wreak thy spleen on, parricide?
Like Nero, thou hast slain thy mother.
Poor Cupid, sobbing, scarce could speak;
Indeed, Mamma, I did not know ye:
Alas! how easy my mistake!
I took you for your likeness, Chloe.

On a certain Beauty.

MISTAKEN nature here has join'd
A beauteous face and ugly mind;
In vain the faultless features strike,
When soul and body are unlike:
Pity that snowy breast should hide
Deceit, and avarice, and pride.
So in rich jars, from China brought,
With glowing colors gaily wrought,
Ofttimes the subtle spider dwells,
With secret venom bloated swells;
Weaves all his fatal nets within,
As unsuspected as unseen.

That Lyce painted; should they flee,
Like simple birds, into a net
So grossly woven and ill-set;
Her own teeth would undo the knot,
And let all go that she had got.
These teeth my Lyce must not show,
If she would bite: her lovers, though
Like birds they stoop at seeming grapes,
Are disabus'd when first she gapes:
The rotten bones discover'd there,
Show 'tis a painted sepulchre.

To Mr. POPE.

DEPEND not upon verse for fame,
Though none can equal thine:
Our language never rests the same;
'Twill rise, or 'twill decline.

Thy wreaths, in course of fleeting hours,
Too soon will be decay'd;
But story lasts, though modern flow'rs
Of poetry must fade.

A surer way then wouldst thou find
Thy glory to prolong,
Whilst there remains amongst mankind
The sense of right and wrong;

Thy fame with nature's self shall end,
Let future times but know
That Atterbury was thy friend,
And Bentley was thy foe.

ledge glides,
Silently strong, and its deep bottom hides.

The Royal Knotter. Sir CH. SEDLEY.

AH, happy people! ye must thrive,
While thus the royal pair does strive
Both to advance your glory!
While he by's valor conquers France,
She manufactures does advance,
And makes thread-fringes for ye.

Blest we! who from such queens are freed
Who, by vain superstition led,
Are always telling beads:
But here's a queen now, thanks to God?
Who, when she rides in coach abroad,
Is always knotting threads.

Then haste, victorious Nassau, haste;
And when the summer show is past,
Let all thy trumpets sound:
The fringe which this campaign has wrought,
Though 't cost the nation scarce a groat,
Thy conquests will surround.

What's Honor?

NOT to be captious, not unjustly fight;
'Tis to confess what's wrong, and do what's right.

A fair Ground for Pride.

JACK his own merit sees: this gives him
pride,
For he sees more than all the world beside.

By PRIOR.

YES, ev'ry poet is a fool;
By demonstration Ned can show it.
Happy, could Ned's inverted rule
Prove ev'ry fool to be a poet.

Dean Swift's Curate.

I MARCH'D three miles thro' scorching sand,
With zeal in heart, and notes in hand;
I rode four more to Great St. Mary,
Using four legs when two were weary.
To three fair virgins I did tie men,
In the close bands of pleasing Hymen;
I dipp'd two babes in holy water,
And purified their mothers after.
Within an hour and eke an half,
I preach'd three congregations deaf;
While thund'ring out with lungs long-winded,
I chopp'd so fast that few there minded.
My emblem, the laborious sun,
Saw all these mighty labors done
Before one race of his was run!
All this perform'd by Robert Hewit:
What mortal else could e'er go through it?

The Miser's Feast.

HIS chimney smokes! it is some omen dire!
His neighbours are alarm'd; and cry out, Fire!

On Sir Godfrey Kneller's painting, for the Author, the Statues of Apollo, Venus, and Hercules. POPE.

WHAT God, what genius did the pencil
When Kneller painted these? [move,
'Twas friendship—warm as Phœbus, kind as
Love,
And strong as Hercules.

The Duke of Ch——s. SWIFT.

JAMES B——was the Dean's familiar friend:
James grows a Duke, their friendship here must end.
Surely the Dean deserves a sore rebuke,
From knowing James, to say he knows a duke.

The Doctor and the Patient.

SLEPT you well? "Very well." My draught did good.
"It did no harm: for yonder it hath stood."

Verses occasioned by Mr. Aikman's death.
THOMSON.

As those we love decay, we die in part;
String after string is sever'd from the heart;
Till loosen'd life, at last but breathing clay,
Without one pang is glad to fall away.
Unhappy he who latest feels the blow,
Whose eyes have wept o'er every friend laid low;
Dragg'd ling'ring on from partial death to death,
Till, dying, all he can resign is breath.

To the Rev. Mr. Murdoch, Rector of Straddishall, in Suffolk. THOMSON.

THUS safely low, my friend, thou canst not fall;
Here reigns a deep tranquillity o'er all;
No noise, no care, no vanity, no strife;
Men, woods, and trees, all breathe untroubled
life:
Then keep each passion down, however dear;
Trust me, the tender are the most severe.
Guard, while 'tis thine, with philosophic ease,
And ask no joy but that of virtuous peace!
That bids defiance to the storms of fate:
High bliss is only for a higher state.

The Power of Time. SWIFT.

IF neither brass nor marble can withstand
The mortal force of Time's destructive hand:
If mountains sink to vales, if cities die,
And less'ning rivers mourn their fountains dry—
When my old cassock, said a Welch divine,
Is out at elbows, why should I repine?

Epigram by DR. DODDRIDGE, on his Motto,
Dum vivimus, vivamus.

LIVE while you live, the epicure will say,
And take the pleasure of the present day.
Live while you live, the sacred preacher cries,
And give to God each moment as it flies.
Lord, in my view let both united be!
I live in pleasure when I live to Thee.

On the Publication of Mrs. Rowe's Poems since her Death.

THUS Philomela sung, on earth detain'd,
While cumb'rous clay the rising soul restrain'd;
Now the freed spirit, with th' angelic choir,
In fields of light attunes th' immortal lyre,
And hymns her God in strains more soft, more strong—
There only could she learn a loftier song.

By Lord LANSDOWNE.

BELIEVE me, Chloe, those perfumes that cost
Such sums to sweeten thee, is treasure lost;
Not all Arabia would sufficient be;
Thou smell'st not of thy sweets, they stink of thee.

By PRIOR.

WHEN Topewell thought fit from the world
to retreat,
As full of Champagne as an egg's full of meat:
He waked in the boat, and to Charon he said,
He would be row'd back, for he was not yet
dead.
Trim the boat, and sit quiet, stern Charon replied:
You may have forgot, you was drunk when you
died.

Firmness under Distress.

BRUTUS unmov'd heard how his Portia fell:
Should Jack's wifedie, he would behave as well.

By Dean SWIFT.

DEAF, giddy, helpless, left alone,
To all my friends a burthen grown:
No more I hear my church's bell
Than if it rang out for my knell:
At thunder now no more I start
Than at the rumbling of a cart:
Nay, what's incredible, alack
I hardly hear a woman's clack.

On a Fan which bore the Story of Cephalus and Procris, with this Motto: "Aura, veni."

Come, gentle Air, th' Æolian shepherd said,
While Procris panted in the secret shade;

Come, gentle air, the fairer Delia cries,
While at her feet her swain expiring lies:
Lo! the glad gales o'er all her beauties stray,
Breathe on her lips, and in her bosom play.
In Delia's hand this toy is fatal found,
Nor could that fabled dart more surely wound;
Both gifts destructive to the givers prove,
Alike both lovers fall by those they love:
Yet guiltless too this bright destroyer lives,
At random wounds, nor knows the wound she gives:

She views the story with attentive eyes,
And pities Procris, while her lover dies.

On an Epigram.

ONE day, in Chelsea meadows walking,
Of poetry and such things talking,
Says Ralph, a merry wag:
An epigram, if smart and good,
In all its circumstances should
Be like a jelly-bag.
Your simile, I own, is new;
But how wilt make it out? says Hugh.
Quoth Ralph, I'll tell thee, friend;
Make it at top both wide, and fit
To hold a budget-full of wit,
And point it at the end.

By Mrs. PILKINGTON.

STELLA and Flavia ev'ry hour
Unnumber'd hearts surprise;
In Stella's soul lies all her power,
And Flavia's in her eyes.
More boundless Flavia's conquests are,
And Stella's more confin'd;
All can discern a face that's fair,
But few a lovely mind.
Stella, like Britain's monarch, reigns
O'er cultivated lands;
Like eastern tyrants Flavia deigns
To rule o'er barren sands.
Then boast, fair Flavia, boast your face,
Your beauty's only store:
Each day that makes thy charms decrease,
Will give to Stella more.

To Mr. Pope on his Dunciad.

THE raven, rook, and pert jackdaw,
Though neither birds of moral kind,
Yet serve, if hang'd, or stuff'd with straw,
To show us which way blows the wind.
Thus dirty knaves, or chattering fools,
Strung up by dozens in thy lay,
Teach more by half than Dennis' rules,
And point instruction ev'ry way.
With Egypt's art thy pen may strive:
One potent drop let this but shed,
And every rogue that stunk alive
Becomes a precious mummy dead.

TREASON does never prosper: what's the reason?
Why, when it prospers, none dare call it treason.

On a Bee stifted in Honey.

FROM flow'r to flow'r, with eager pains,
See the blest busy lab'rer fly;
When all that from her toil she gains
Is, in the sweets she hoards to die.
'Tis thus, would man the truth believe,
With life's soft sweets, each fav'rite joy:
If we taste wisely, they relieve,
But, if we plunge too deep, destroy.

On Mr. Pope's Death.

ARISE, ye glimmering stars of wit!
For, lo! the Sun of Verse is set.

By Dr. SWIFT.

As Thomas was cudgell'd one day by his wife,
He took to his heels, and he ran for his life.
Tom's three dearest friends came by in the squabble,
And screen'd him at once from the shrew and
the rabble;
Then ventur'd to give him some wholesome advice:
But Tom is a fellow of honor so nice,
Too proud to take counsel, too wise to take warning,
That he sent to all three a challenge next morning.
He fought with all three; thrice ventur'd his life; [his wife.
Then went home, and was cudgell'd again by

On Dr. Blackmore.

LET Blackmore still, in good king Arthur's vein,
To Fleckno's empire his just right maintain;
Let him his own to common sense oppose,
With praise and slander maul both friends and
foes;
Let him great Dryden's awful name profane,
And learned Garth with envious pride disdain;
Let the quack scribble any thing but bills:
His satire wounds not, but his physic kills.

On Mr. Butler's Monument in Westminster-Abbey.

S. WESTLEY.

WHILST Butler, needy wretch! was yet alive,
No gen'rous patron would a dinner give:
See him, when starv'd to death, and turn'd to
Presented with a monumental bust. [dust,
The poet's fate is here in emblem shown;
He ask'd for bread, and he receiv'd a stone.

*Inscription for a Fountain adorned with Queen
Anne's and the Duke of Marlborough's Statues, and the chief Rivers of the World round the Work.*

PRIOR.

Ye active streams, where'er your waters flow,
Let distant climes and farthest nations know,
What ye from Thames and Danube have been taught,
How Anne commanded, and how Marlbro'
fought.

By W. CONGREVE.

SEE, see, she wakes, Sabina wakes,
And now the sun begins to rise;
Less glorious is the morn that breaks
From his bright beams, than her bright eyes.
With light united, day they give,
But different fates ere night fulfil:
How many by his warmth will live!
How many will her coldness kill!

By JOSIAH RELPH.

No, Varus hates a thing that's base;
I own, indeed, he's got a knack
Of flatt'ring people to their face,
But scorns to do't behind their back.

Under a Picture of Mr. Poyntz. LYTTTELTON.

SUCH is thy form, O Poyntz! but who shall
find
A hand or colors to express thy mind?
A mind unmov'd by ev'ry vulgar fear;
In a false world, that dares to be sincere:
Wise without art, without ambition great;
Though firm, yet pliant; active, though sedate;
With all the richest stores of learning fraught,
Yet better still by native prudence taught:
That, fond the griefs of the distress'd to heal,
Can pity frailties it could never feel;
That, when misfortune sued, ne'er sought to
know
What sect, what party, whether friend or foe:
That, fix'd on equal virtue's temp'rate laws,
Despises calumny, and shuns applause:
That to his own perfections singly blind,
Would for another think this praise design'd.

By JOSIAH RELPH.

WHEN from her bosom Arria pull'd the blade,
Thus to her lord the tender heroine said:
The wound I gave myself with ease I bear,
Alas! I die by that which kills my dear.

The Commons' Petition to King Charles the Second. ROCHESTER.

IN all humility we crave
Our sovereign may be our slave;
And humbly beg that he may be
Betray'd by us most loyally:
And if he please once to lay down
His sceptre, dignity, and crown,
We'll make him for the time to come,
The greatest prince in Christendom.

The King's Answer.

CHARLES, at this time having no need,
Thanks you as much as if you did.

The Worm-Doctor. J. RELPH.

VAGUS, advanced on high, proclaims his skill,
By cakes of wondrous force the worms to kill;
A scornful ear the wiser sort impart,
And laugh at Vagus's pretended art.
But well can Vagus what he boasts perform,
For man (as Job hath told us) is a worm.

On Plutarch's Statue. From the Greek.

DRYDEN.

WISE, honest Plutarch! to thy deathless
praise
The sons of Rome this grateful statue raise:
For why? both Greece and Rome thy fame
have shar'd;
Their heroes written, and their lives compar'd.
But thou thyself couldst never write thy own:
Their lives had parallels, but thine has none.

On the Statue of Niobe. From the Greek.

To stone the gods have changed her, but in vain:
The sculptor's art has made her breathe again.

To a young Gentleman.

NATURE has done her part: do thou but
Learning and sense let decency refine. [thine;
For vain applause transgress not virtue's rules;
A witty sinner is the worst of fools.

Ulysses' Dog. POPE.

WHEN wise Ulysses, from his native coast
Long kept by wars, and long by tempests tost,
Arriv'd at last, poor, old, disguised, alone,
To all his friends, and e'en his queen, unknown:
Changed as he was with age, and toils, and cares,
Furrowed his rev'rend face, and white his hairs,
In his own palace forced to ask his bread,
Scorn'd by those slaves his former bounty fed,
Forgot of all his own domestic crew;
The faithful dog alone his master knew!
Unfed, unhous'd, neglected, on the clay,
Like an old servant now cashier'd he lay;
And, though e'en then expiring on the plain,
Touch'd with resentment of ungrateful man,
And longing to behold his ancient lord again.
Him when he saw—he rose, and crawl'd to
meet,
'Twas all he could, and fawn'd, and kiss'd his feet,
Seiz'd with dumb joy: then falling by his side,
Own'd his returning lord, look'd up, and died.

To King Charles I. on his Navy. WALLER.

SHOULD nature's self invade the world again,
And o'er the centre spread the liquid main,
Thy pow'r were safe, and her destructive hand
Would but enlarge the bounds of thy command:
Thy dreadful fleet would style thee lord of all,
And rise in triumph o'er the drowned ball.

On Mrs. Barbieri's first Appearance on the Stage.

No pleasure now from Nicolini's tongue,
In vain he strives to move us with his song:
On a fair Syren we have fix'd our choice,
And wait with longing ears for Barbieri's voice:
When, lo! the nymph by bashful awe betray'd,
Her falt'ring tongue denies her looks its aid;

But so much innocence adorns her fears,
And with such grace her modesty she wears,
By her disorder all her charms increase,
And, had she better sung, she 'd pleas'd us less.

On the Spectator.

WHEN first the Tatler to a mute was turn'd,
Great Britain for her censor's silence mourn'd; Robb'd of his sprightly beams, she wept the
night,
Till the Spectator rose, and blaz'd as bright.
So the first man the sun's first setting view'd,
And sigh'd till circling day his joys renew'd;
Yet doubtful how that second sun to name,
Whether a bright successor or the same:
So we—but now from this suspense are freed;
Since all agree who both with judgement read,
'Tis the same sun, and does himself succeed.

To the Lord Chancellor King; alluding to his Motto, "Labor ipse voluptas!"

'Tis not the splendor of the place,
The gilded coach, the purse, the mace,
And all the pompous train of state,
With crowds which at the levee wait,
That make you happy, make you great:
But when mankind you strive to bless,
With all the talents you possess;
When all the joys you can receive
Flow from the benefits you give;
This takes the heart, this conquers spite,
And makes the heavy burden light.
True pleasure, rightly understood,
Is only labor to do good.

Written in a Lady's Milton. PRIOR.

WITH virtue strong as yours had Eve been arm'd, [charm'd
In vain the fruit had blush'd, or serpent
Nor had our bliss by penitence been bought—
Nor had frail Adam fell, nor Milton wrote.

From Greek.

DEMOCRITUS, dear droll! revisit earth,
And with our follies glut thy heighten'd mirth.
Sad Heraclitus, serious wretch! return,
In louder grief our greater crimes to mourn.
Between you both, I unconcern'd stand by:
Hurt, can I laugh? and honest, need I cry?

A Character of an old Rake.

SCORN'D by the wise, detested by the good,
Nor understanding aught, nor understood;
Profane, obscene, loud, frivolous, and pert;
Proud without spirit, vain without desert;
Affecting passions vice has long subdued;
Desp'rately gay, and impotently lewd;
And, as thy weak companions round thee sit,
For eminence in folly deem'd a wit.

Dr. Wynter to Dr. Cheyney, on his Books in favor of a Vegetable Diet.

TELL me from whom, fat-headed Scot,
Thou didst thy system learn:
From Hippocrate thou hadst it not,
Nor Celsus, nor Pitcairn.

Suppose we own that milk is good,
And say the same of grass;
The one for babes is only food,
The other for an ass.

Doctor! one new prescription try;
(A friend's advice forgive)
Eat grass, reduce thyself, and die:
Thy patients then may live.

Dr. Cheyney to Dr. Wynter.

MY system, doctor, is my own,
No tutor I pretend:
My blunders hurt myself alone,
But yours your dearest friend.

Were you to milk and straw confin'd,
Thrice happy might you be;
Perhaps you might regain your mind,
And from your wit get free.

I can't your kind prescription try,
But heartily forgive;
'Tis natural you should bid me die,
That you yourself may live.

A Smart Repartee. SWIFT.

CRIES Sylvia to a reverend Dean,
What reason can be giv'n,
Since marriage is a holy thing,
That there is none in heav'n?
There are no women, he replied.
She quick returns the jest:
Women there are, but I'm afraid
They cannot find a priest.

On Glover's Leonidas being compared to Virgil.

EQUAL to Virgil! It may, perhaps:
But then, by Jove, 'tis Dr. Trapp's.

On a bad Translation.

HIS work now done, he'll publish it no doubt:
For sure I am that murder will come out.

To a bad Fiddler.

OLD Orpheus play'd so well, he mov'd Old
Nick;
Whilst thou mov'st nothing but thy fiddle-stick.

On Sir John Vanbrugh's Device of a Lion and a Cock, at Blenheim.

HAD Marlborough's troops in Gaul no better
fought,
Than Van, to grace his fame, in marble wrought,
No more in arms than he in emblems skill'd,
The cock had drove the lion from the field.

On the Bridge at Blenheim.

THE lofty arch his high ambition shows,
The stream an emblem of his bounty flows.

To a Lady. A. HILL.

IF fix'd on yours my eyes in prayers you see,
You must not call my zeal idolatry;
For since our Maker's throne is placed so high,
That only in his works the God we spy,
And what's most bright most gives him to our
view,
I look most near him when I look on you.

The Antidote.

WHEN Lesbia first I saw, so heavenly fair,
With eyes so bright, and with that awful air;
I thought my heart, which durst so high aspire,
As bold as his who snatch'd celestial fire.
But, soon as e'er the beauteous idiot spoke,
Forth from her coral lips such folly broke,
Like balm the trickling nonsense heal'd my
wound,
And what her eyes enthrall'd, her tongue unbound.

The Female Prattler.

FROM morn to night, from day to day,
At all times, and in ev'ry place,
You scold, repeat, and sing, and say,
Nor are there hopes you'll ever cease.
Forbear, my Fannia; O, forbear,
If your own health or ours you prize;
For all mankind that hear you, swear
Your tongue's more killing than your eyes.
Your tongue's a traitor to your face,
Your fame's by your own noise obscur'd:
All are distracted while they gaze,
But, if they listen, they are cur'd.
Your silence would acquire more praise
Than all you say, or all you write:
One look ten thousand charms displays;
Then hush! and be an angel quite.

*The Avaro. **

THUS to the master of a house,
Which, like a church, would starve a mouse;
Which never guest had entertain'd,
Nor meat nor wine its floors had stain'd,
I said: "Well, Sir, 'tis vastly neat;
But where d' you drink, and where d' you eat?
If one may judge by rooms so fine,
It costs you more in mops than wine.

Effectual Malice.

OF all the pens which my poor rhymes molest,
Cotin's the sharpest, and succeeds the best;
Others outrageous scold, and rail downright
With serious rancor, and true Christian spite;
But he, more sly, pursues his fell design;
Writes scoundrel verses, and then says they're mine.

On a Regiment sent to Oxford, and a Present of Books to Cambridge, by King George I. 1715. By Dr. TRAPP.

THE king, observing with judicious eyes
The state of both his universities,
To one he sent a regiment; for why?
That learned body wanted loyalty.
To th' other he sent books, as well discerning
How much that loyal body wanted learning.

Answered by Sir William Browne.

THE king to Oxford sent his troop of horse,
For Tories own no argument but force;
With equal care to Cambridge books he sent,
For Whigs allow no force but argument.

The Friendly Contest.

WHILE Cam and Isis their sad tribute bring
Of rival grief, to weep their pious king,
The bards of Isis half had been forgot,
Had not the sons of Cam in pity wrote; [curse,
From their learn'd brothers they took off the
And prov'd their verse not bad, by writing worse.

Against Life. From the Greek of Posidippus.

WHAT tranquil road, unvex'd by strife,
Can mortals choose through human life?
Attend the courts, attend the bar,
There discord reigns, and endless jar:
At home the weary wretches find
Severe disquietude of mind:
To till the fields gives toil and pain;
Eternal terrors sweep the main:
If rich, we fear to lose our store;
Need and distress await the poor:
Sad cares the bands of Hymen give;
Friendless, forlorn, th' unmarried live:
Are children born, we anxious groan;
Childless, our lack of heirs we moan:
Wild giddy schemes our youth engage;
Weakness and wants depress old age.
Would fate then with my wish comply,
I'd never live, or quickly die.

For Life. From the Greek of Metrodorus.

MANKIND may rove, unvex'd by strife,
Through ev'ry road of human life.
Fair wisdom regulates the bar,
And peace concludes the wordy war:
At home auspicious mortals find
Serene tranquillity of mind:
All-beauteous nature decks the plain;
And merchants plough for gold the main:
Respect arises from our store;
Security from being poor:
More joys the bands of Hymen give;
Th' unmarried with more freedom live:
If parents, our blest lot we own;
Childless, we have no cause to moan:
Firm vigor crowns our youthful stage;
And venerable hairs old age.
Since all is good, then who would cry,
I'd never live, or quickly die?

The Revenge of America. WARTON.

WHEN Cortez' furious legions flew
O'er ravaged fields of rich Peru,
Struck with his bleeding people's woes,
Old India's awful Genius rose:
He sat on Andes' topmost stone,
And heard a thousand nations groan;
For grief his feathery crown he tore,
To see huge Plato foam with gore;
He broke his arrows, stamp'd the ground,
To view his cities smoking round.

What woes, he cried, hath lust of gold
O'er my poor country widely roll'd!
Plund'ers, proceed! my bowels tear:
But ye shall meet destruction there.
From the deep-vaulted mine shall rise
Th' insatiate fiend, pale Avarice;
Whose steps shall trembling Justice fly,
Peace, Order, Law, and Amity!
I see all Europe's children curst
With lucre's universal thirst;
The rage that sweeps my sons away,
My baneful gold shall well repay.

Mutual Pity.

TOM, ever jovial, ever gay,
To appetite a slave,
In riot throws his life away,
And laughs to see me grave.
'Tis thus that we two disagree;
So diff'rent is our whim:
The fellow fondly laughs at me,
While I could cry for him.

Universal Complaisance.

THROUGH servile flattery thou dost all commend—
Who cares to please whom no man can offend?

Under the Statue of a Water Nymph, at Stourhead, Somersetshire. From the Latin.

POPE.

NYMPH of the grot, these sacred springs I keep,
And to the murmur of these waters sleep;
Ah, spare my slumbers! gently tread the cave,
Or drink in silence, or in silence lave.

On his own Grotto. POPE.

THOU who shalt stop where Thames' translucent wave
Shines a broad mirror thro' the shadowy cave:
Where ling'ring drops from min'ral roofs distil,
And pointed crystals break the sparkling rill;
Unpolish'd gems no ray on pride bestow,
And latent metals innocently glow:
Approach! great Nature studiously behold,
And eye the mine without a wish for gold.

Approach, but awful!—Lo! the Egerian grot,
Where, nobly pensive, St. John sat and thought;
Where British sighs from dying Wyndham stole,
And the bright flame was shot thro' Marchmont's soul.
Let such, such only, tread this sacred floor,
Who dare to love their country, and be poor.

A prudent Choice.

WHEN Loveless married Lady Jenny,
Whose beauty was the ready penny:
I chose her, says he, like old plate,
Not for the fashion, but the weight.

On a great House adorned with Statues.

THE walls are thick, the servants thin;
The gods without, the dev'l within.

On a hasty Marriage.

MARRIED! 'tis well! a mighty blessing!
But poor's the joy, no coin possessing.
In ancient times, when folk did wed,
'Twas to be one at "board and bed:"
But hard's his case who can't afford
His charmer either bed or board.

The Incurious.

THREE years in London Bobadil had been,
Yet not the lions nor the tombs had seen;
I cannot tell the cause without a smile—
The rogue had been in Newgate all the while.

To a Spendthrift disinherited.

HIS whole estate thy father, by his will,
Gave to the poor—Thou hast good title still.

On a pale Lady.

WHENCE comes it that, in Clara's face,
The lily only has a place?
Is it, that the absent rose
Is gone to paint her husband's nose?

The Musical Contest. SWIFT.

SOME say that Signior Bononcini,
Compar'd to Handel's a mere ninny:
Others aver that to him Handel
Is scarcely fit to hold a candle.
Strange! that such difference should be
'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee!

The Happy Physiognomy.

You ask why Roome* diverts you with his jokes,
Yet, if he prints, is dull as other folks?
You wonder at it!—This, Sir, is the case:
The jest is lost unless he prints his face.

On seeing a Miser at a Concert.

MUSIC has charms to soothe a savage breast,
To calm the tyrant, and relieve th' opprest:
But Vauxhall concert's more attractive pow'r
Unlock'd Sir Richard's pocket at threescore.
O strange effect of music's matchless force,
T' extract two shillings from a miser's purse!

On certain Pastorals.

So rude and tuneless are thy lays,
The weary audience vow,
'Tis not th' Arcadian swain that sings,
But 'tis his herds that low.

On a Gentleman who expended his Fortune in Horse-Racing.

JOHN ran so long, and ran so fast,
No wonder he ran out at last;
He ran in debt; and then to pay,
He distanc'd all—and ran away.

On the Collar of a Dog presented by Mr. Pope to the Prince of Wales.

I AM his Highness' dog at Kew;
Pray tell me, Sir, whose dog are you?

From the Greek.

A BLOOMING youth lies buried here;
Euphemius, to his country dear:
Nature adorn'd his mind and face
With ev'ry muse and ev'ry grace:
Prepar'd the marriage state to prove,
But Death had quicker wings than Love.

On Sophocles.

WIND, gentle evergreen, to form a shade
Around the tomb where Sophocles is laid:
Sweet ivy, wind thy boughs, and intertwine
With blushing roses and the clust'ring vine:
Thus will thy lasting leaves, with beauties
hung,
Prove grateful emblems of the lays he sung:
Whose soul, exalted, like a god of wit
Among the muses and the graces writ.

On the Countess Dowager of Pembroke.

BEN JONSON.

UNDERNEATH this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sydney's sister, Pembroke's mother:
Death, ere thou hast slain another,
Fair, and wise, and good as she,
Time shall throw his dart at thee.

By BEN JONSON.

UNDERNEATH this stone doth lie
As much virtue as could die;
Which, when alive, did vigour give
To as much beauty as could live.
If she had a single fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.

Intended for Dryden. POPE.

THIS Sheffield rais'd. The sacred dust
below
Was Dryden once: the rest who does not know?

On Mr. Rowe. POPE.

THY reliques, Rowe! to this sad shrine we trust, [bust.
And near thy Shakspeare place thy honour'd
O! next him, skill'd to draw the tender tear,
For never heart felt passion more sincere;
To nobler sentiments to fire the brave,
For never Briton more disdain'd a slave;
Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest;
Bless'd in thy genius, in thy love too bless'd!
And bless'd, that, timely from our scene re-
mov'd,
Thy soul enjoys the liberty it lov'd.

On Mr. Fenton. POPE.

THIS modest stone, what few vain marbles
can,
May truly say, "Here lies an honest man:"
A poet, bless'd beyond a poet's fate,
Whom Heaven kept sacred from the proud and great.
Foe to loud praise, and friend to learned ease,
Content with science in the vale of peace,
Calmly he look'd on either life, and here
Saw nothing to regret, or there to fear;
From nature's temp'rate feast rose satisfied,
Thank'd Heav'n that he had liv'd, and that he died.

On Mr. Gay. POPE.

OF manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit a man, simplicity a child;
With native humor temp'ring virtuous rage,
Form'd to delight at once and lash the age:
Above temptation in a low estate,
And uncorrupted e'en among the great:
A safe companion, and an easy friend,
Unblam'd thro' life, lamented in his end.
These are thy honors! not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—Here lies Gay.

On Tom D'Urfey.

HERE lies the lyric, who with tale and song
Did life to threescore years and ten prolong:
His tale was pleasant, and his song was sweet;
His heart was cheerful—but his thirst was great.
Grieve, reader! grieve, that he, too soon grown
His song has ended, and his tale has told. [old,

To Aaron Hill, Esq. S. RICHARDSON.

Tho' unencumber'd with the clogs of rhyme,
Where tinkling sounds for want of meaning
chime, [course,
Which, like the rock in Shannon's midway
Divide the sense, and interrupt its force;
Well may we judge so strong and clear a rill
Flows higher from the muses' sacred Hill.

PRIOR on himself.

To me 'tis given to die, to thee 'tis given
To live; alas! one moment sets us even;
Mark how impartial is the will of Heaven!

Inscription on an Urn at Lord Cork's, to the Memory of the Dog Hector.

STRANGER, behold the mighty Hector's tomb!
See! to what end both dogs and heroes come.
These are the honors by his master paid
To Hector's manes and lamented shade:
Nor words nor honors can enough commend
The social dog—nay more, the faithful friend!
From nature all his principles he drew;
By nature faithful, vigilant, and true;
His looks and voice his inward thoughts ex-
press'd;
He growl'd in anger, and in love caress'd.
No human falsehood lurk'd beneath his heart;
Brave without boasting, gen'rous without art.
When Hector's virtues man, proud man, displays,
Truth shall adorn his tomb with Hector's praise.

On an Old Woman who sold Pots at Chester.

BENEATH this stone lies Cath'rine Gray,
Chang'd to a lifeless lump of clay;
By earth and clay she got her pelf,
Yet now she's turn'd to earth herself.
Ye weeping friends, let me advise,
Abate your grief, and dry your eyes;
For what avails a flood of tears?
Who knows but in a run of years,
In some tall pitcher, or broad pan,
She in her shop may be again?

To the Pie-house Memory of Nell Batchelor, the Oxford Pie-Woman.

HERE, into the dust
The mouldering crust
Of Eleanor Batchelor's shoven;
Well vers'd in the arts
Of pies, custards, and tarts,
And the lucrative skill of the oven.

When she'd liv'd long enough,
She made her last puff—
A puff by her husband much prais'd:
Now here she doth lie,
And makes a dirt-pie,
In hopes that her crust shall be rais'd.

On Sir John Vanbrugh, the Poet and Architect.

By Dr. EVANS.

LIE heavy on him, earth! for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

Posthumous Fame.

A MONSTER, in a course of vice grown old,
Leaves to his gaping heir his ill-gain'd gold:
Now breathes his bust, now are his virtues shown,
Their date commencing with the sculptur'd
stone.
If on his specious marble we rely,
Pity a worth like his should ever die!
If credit to his real life we give,
Pity a wretch like him should ever live!

On the Hon. Simon Harcourt. POPE.

To this sad shrine, whoe'er thou art, draw
near:
Here lies the friend most lov'd, the son most
dear;
Who ne'er knew joy but friendship might divide,
Or gave his father grief—but when he died.
How vain is reason, eloquence how weak,
If Pope must tell what Harcourt cannot speak!
Yet let thy once-lov'd friend inscribe thy stone,
And with a father's sorrow mix his own!

On General Withers. POPE.

HERE, Withers, rest! thou bravest, gentlest
mind,
Thy country's friend, but more of human kind!
O born to arms! O worth in youth approv'd!
O soft humanity, in age belov'd!
For thee the hardy vet'ran drops a tear,
And the gay courtier feels the sigh sincere.
Withers, adieu! yet not with thee remove
Thy martial spirit, or thy social love!
Amidst corruption, luxury, and rage,
Still leave some ancient virtues to our age:
Nor let us say, those English glories gone,
The last true Briton lies beneath this stone.

On Mr. Craggs. POPE.

STATESMAN, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
In action faithful, and in honor clear!
Who broke no promise, serv'd no private end;
Who gain'd no title, and who lost no friend!
Ennobled by himself, by all approv'd;
Prais'd, wept, and honour'd, by the muse he lov'd.

On Sir Isaac Newton.

APPROACH, ye wise of soul, with awe divine: [shrine!
'Tis Newton's name that consecrates this
That sun of knowledge, whose meridian ray
Kindled the gloom of nature into day!

That soul of science, that unbounded mind,
That genius which ennobled human kind!
Confess'd supreme of men, his country's pride;
And half esteemed an angel—till he died:
Who in the eye of Heaven like Enoch stood,
And thro' the paths of knowledge walk'd with
God:
Whose fame extends, a sea without a shore!
Who but forsook one world to know the laws of more.

On the same. POPE.

NATURE and nature's laws lay hid in night:
God said, "Let Newton be!" and all was light.

From COWLEY.

HERE lies the great—False marble, tell me where:
Nothing but poor and sordid dust lies here.

On a Young Lady. MALLETT.

THIS humble grave though no proud structure grace,
Yet truth and goodness sanctify the place:
Yet blameless virtue, that adorn'd thy bloom,
Lamented maid! now weeps upon thy tomb:
Escap'd from death, O safe on that calm shore,
Where sin, and pain, and passion, are no more!
What never wealth could buy, nor pow'r decree,
Regard and pity, wait sincere on thee!
Lo! soft remembrance drops a pious tear,
And holy friendship sits a mourner here.

On Mr. Aikman and his Son. MALLETT.

DEAR to the wise and good, beneath this
stone
Here sleep in peace the father and the son!
By virtue, as by nature, close allied;
The painter's genius, but without the pride:
Worth unambitious, wit afraid to shine,
Honor's clear light, and friendship's warmth divine.
The son, fair rising, knew too short a date!
But O! how more severe the parent's fate!
He saw him torn untimely from his side,
Felt all a father's anguish, wept, and died.

On an Infant.

To the dark and silent tomb
Soon I hasted from the womb;
Scarce the dawn of life began
Ere I measur'd out my span.

I no smiling pleasures knew;
I no gay delights could view;
Joyless sojourner was I,
Only born to weep and die.

Happy infant, early blest!
Rest, in peaceful slumber rest;
Early rescu'd from the cares
Which increase with growing years

No delights are worth thy stay,
Smiling as they seem, and gay;
Short and sickly are they all,
Hardly tasted ere they pall.

All our gaiety is vain,
All our laughter is but pain:
Lasting only and divine,
Is an innocence like thine.

Another.

BENEATH a sleeping infant lies;
To earth her body's lent;
More glorious she'll hereafter rise,
Though not more innocent.

When the archangel's trump shall blow,
And souls to bodies join,
Millions will wish their lives below
Had been as short as thine.

On Two Twin Sisters.

FAIR marble, tell to future days,
That here two virgin-sisters lie,
Whose life employ'd each tongue in praise;
Whose death gave tears to ev'ry eye.

In stature, beauty, years, and fame,
Together as they grew, they shone;
So much alike, so much the same,
That Death mistook them both for one.

Epitaph on Mrs. Mason, in the Cathedral at Bristol. MASON.

TAKE, holy earth! all that my soul holds dear:
Take that best gift which Heaven so lately
gave:
To Bristol's fount I bore with trembling care
Her faded form. She bow'd to taste the wave—
And died. Does youth, does beauty read the line?

Does sympathetic fear their breasts alarm?
Speak, dead Maria! breathe a strain divine;
E'en from the grave thou shalt have power to charm.

Bid them be chaste, be innocent, like thee:
Bid them in duty's sphere as meekly move:
And, if so fair, from vanity as free,
As firm in friendship, and as fond in love.
Tell them, though 'tis an awful thing to die,
('Twas e'en to thee) yet, the dread path once
trod,
Heaven lifts its everlasting portals high,
And bids "the pure in heart behold their God."

Epitaph on Miss Drummond, in the Church of Brodsworth, Yorkshire. MASON.

HERE sleeps what once was beauty, once was grace ; [bin'd

Grace, that with tenderness and sense com-
To form that harmony of soul and face,

Where beauty shines the mirror of the mind.

Such was the maid, that in the morn of youth,

In virgin innocence, in nature's pride,

Blest with each art that owes its charms to truth,

Sunk in her father's fond embrace, and died.
He weeps ; O venerate the holy tear !

Faith lends her aid to ease affliction's load ;

The parent mourns his child upon the bier,

The Christian yields an angel to his God.

Epitaph on Mrs. Clarke. GRAY.

Lo ! where this silent marble weeps,

A friend, a wife, a mother, sleeps ;

A heart, within whose sacred cell

The peaceful virtues lov'd to dwell.

Affection warm, and faith sincere,

And soft humanity, were there.

In agony, in death resign'd,

She felt the wound she left behind.

Her infant image, here below,

Sits smiling on a father's woe :

Whom what awaits, while yet he strays

Along the lonely vale of days ?

A pang to secret sorrow dear ;

A sigh, an unavailing tear,

Till time shall ev'ry grief remove,

With life, with mem'ry, and with love.

On General Wolfe, in the Church of Westerham, in Kent,—where he was born, 1727.

WHILE George in sorrow bows his laurell'd
head,

And bids the artist grace the soldier dead ;

We raise no sculptur'd trophy to thy name,

Brave youth ! the fairest in the lists of fame.

Proud of thy birth, we boast th' auspicious year ;

Struck with thy fall, we shed the gen'ral tear ;

With humble grief inscribe one artless stone,

And from thy matchless honor date our own.

The Prayer of a Wise Heathen.

GREAT Jove, this one petition grant ;
(Thou knowest best what mortals want :)
Ask'd or unask'd, what's good supply ;
What's evil, to our pray'rs deny !

To the Right Hon. Lady Ch———, 1763.

WHEN lovely Portia glitters at the play,
Or, in her birth-night robes, outshines the day ;
From crowds distinguish'd by her grace and air,
Portia the fairest seems, where all are fair :

A kindling passion ev'ry breast alarms,
Each tongue proclaims the triumph of her charms.

But when, retir'd amidst their rural bow'rs,
She cheers th' illustrious patriot's calmer hours ;
Or, smiling, sits her infant tribe among,
And guides to virtue's paths the list'ning
throng :

Behold, amidst these pleasing cares of life,
The tender mother, and th' engaging wife !
More just applause these humbler virtues share,
And Portia shines, as good as she is fair.

An Incident in High Life.

THE Bucks had din'd, and deep in council
sat ;

Their wine was brilliant—but their wit grew flat :

Up starts his Lordship, to the window flies,
And lo ! “ A race ! a race ! ” in rapture cries.

“ Where ? ” quoth Sir John. “ Why, see ! two drops of rain

Start from the summit of the crystal pane :
A thousand pounds, which drop with nimblest
force

Performs its current down the slippery course ! ”

The bets were fix'd ; the dire suspense they wait

For victory pendant on the nod of fate.

Now down the sash, unconscious of the prize,

The bubbles roll—like pearls from Chloe's eyes.

But ah ! the glittering joys of life are short !—
How oft two jostling steeds have spoil'd the sport !

Lo ! thus attraction, by coercive laws,
Th' approaching drops into one bubble draws.

Each curs'd his fate, that thus their project
cross'd ;

How hard their lot, who neither won nor lost !

As a west-country mayor, with formal address,

Was making his speech to the haughty Queen
Bess :

“ The Spaniard,” quoth he, “ with inveterate spleen

Has presum'd to attack you, a poor virgin queen ;

But your majesty's courage has made it appear

That the don had ta'en the wrong sow by the ear.”

A Court Audience.

OLD South, a witty churchman reckon'd,
Was preaching once to Charles the Second ;

But much too serious for a court,

Who at all preaching made a sport,

He soon perceiv'd his audience nod,

Deaf to the zealous man of God.

The doctor stopp'd, began to call,

“ Pray wake the Earl of Lauderdale :

My lord ! why 'tis a monstrous thing !

You snore so loud you'll wake the king.”

On a Dispute between Dr. Radcliffe and Sir Godfrey Kneller.

SIR GODFREY and Radcliffe had one common way
Into one common garden—and each had a key.
Quoth Kneller, “I’ll certainly stop up that door,
If ever I find it unlock’d any more.”
“Your threats,” replies Radcliffe, “disturb not my ease;
And so you don’t paint it, e’en do what you please.”
“You’re smart,” rejoins Kneller; “but say what you will:
I’ll take anything from you—but potion or pill.”

The Empty Gun.

As Dick and Tom in fierce dispute engage,
And face to face the noisy contest wage;
“Don’t cock your chin at me,” Dick smartly cries.
“Fear not—his head’s not charg’d,” a friend replies.

GIVE me the thing that’s pretty, odd, and new:
All ugly, old, odd things—I leave to you.

On erecting a Monument to Shakspeare, under the Direction of Mr. Pope, Lord Burlington, &c.

To mark her Shakspeare’s worth, and Britain’s love,
Let Pope design, and Burlington approve:
Superfluous care! When distant times shall view
This tomb grown old—his works shall still be new.

On Mr. Nash’s Picture at full Length, between the Busts of Sir Isaac Newton and Mr. Pope, at Bath.

CHESTERFIELD.

THE old Egyptians hid their wit
In hieroglyphic dress,
To give men pains in search of it,
And please themselves with guess.
Moderns, to hit the self-same path,
And exercise their parts,
Place figures in a room at Bath:
Forgive them, God of arts!
Newton, if I can judge aright,
All Wisdom does express;
His knowledge gives mankind delight,
Adds to their happiness.
Pope is the emblem of true Wit,
The sunshine of the mind;
Read o’er his works in search of it,
You’ll endless pleasure find.

Nash represents man in the mass,
Made up of wrong and right;
Sometimes a king, sometimes an ass,
Now blunt, and now polite.

The picture placed the busts between,
Adds to the thought much strength;
Wisdom and Wit are little seen,
But Folly’s at full length.

The following Lines were handed up to a beautiful young Lady who was attending the Trial of Criminals at the Assizes in Surrey.

WHILST petty offences and felonies smart,
Is there no jurisdiction for stealing one’s heart?
You, fair one, will smile, and cry, “Laws, I defy you;” [you:
Assur’d that no peers can be summon’d to try
But think not that paltry defence will secure ye;
For the muses and graces will just make a jury.

The Dropsical Man. TAYLOR.

A JOLLY, brave toper, who could not forbear,
Though his life was in danger, old port and stale beer, [drink on,
Gave the doctors the hearing—but still would
Till the dropsy had swell’d him as big as a tun;
The more he took physic the worse still he grew,
And tapping was now the last thing he could do.
Affairs at this crisis, and doctors come down,
He began to consider—so sent for his son.
Tom, see by what courses I’ve shorten’d my life,
I’m leaving the world ere I’m forty and five;
More than probable ’tis, that in twenty-four hours
This manor, this house, and estate, will be yours;
My early excesses may teach you this truth,
That ’tis working for death to drink hard in one’s youth.
Says Tom (who’s a lad of a generous spirit,
And not like young rakes, who’re in haste to inherit)
Sir, don’t be dishearten’d; although it be true,
Th’ operation is painful, and hazardous too,
’Tis no more than what many a man has gone through.

And then, as for years, you may yet be call’d young,
Your life after this may be happy and long.
Don’t flatter me, Tom, was the father’s reply,
With a jest in his mouth, and a tear in his eye:
Too well, by experience, my vessels, thou know’st, [ghost.

EPIGRAMS from MARTIAL.

To James Harris, Esq.

MARTIAL, Book iv. Ep. 87.

WOULDST thou, by Attic taste improv’d,
By all be read, by all be lov’d,

To learned Harris' curious eye,
By me advis'd, dear Muse, apply:
In him the perfect judge you'll find,
In him the candid friend, and kind.
If he repeats, if he approves,
If he the laughing muscles moves,
Thou nor the critic's sneer shalt mind,
Nor be to pies or trunks consign'd.
If he condemns, away you fly,
And mount in paper-kites the sky,
Or dead 'mongst Grub-street's records lie.

Is there, who can on his great self depend?
Now let me die, but Harris is this friend.

Book ii. Ep. 80.

WHEN Fannius should have 'scap'd his foe,
His own hands stopp'd his breath:
And was't not madness, I would know,
By dying to 'scape death?

The same.

HIMSELF he slew, when he the foe would
fly;
What madness this—for fear of death to die!

Book x. Ep. 78.

VARUS did lately me to supper call;
The furniture was large, the feast but small;
The tables spread with plate, not meat; they put
Much to accost the eye, nought for the gut.
We came to feast our bellies, not our eyes;
Pray take away your gold; give us some pies.

Book i. Ep. 16.

THOU, whom (if faith or honor recommends
A friend) I rank amongst my dearest friends,
Remember you are now almost threescore;
Few days of life remain, if any more:
Defer not what no future time insures;
And only what is past, esteem that yours.
Successive cares and troubles for you stay;
Pleasure not so; it nimbly fleets away;
Then seize it fast: embrace it ere it flies;
In the embrace it vanishes and dies.
"I'll live to-morrow," will a wise man say?
To-morrow is too late—then live to-day.

From Martial, literally translated.

A LANDLORD at Bath put upon me a queer hum: [mere rum*.
I ask'd him for punch, and the dog gave me

Book ii. Ep. 41.

YES; I submit, my lord; you've gain'd your end: [friend.
I'm now your slave—that would have been your
I'll bow, I'll cringe, be supple as your glove—
Respect, adore you—every thing, but love.

Book viii. Ep. 19.

HAL says he's poor, in hopes you'll say he's not;
But take his word for't: Hal's not worth a groat.

Book i. Ep. 13.

WHEN from her breast chaste Arria snatch'd
the sword,
And gave the deathful weapon to her lord;
My wound, she said, believe me, does not
smart,
But thine alone, my Pætus, pains my heart.

* Merum is not translated at all.

Book ix. Ep. 82.

My works the reader and the hearer praise;
They're incorrect, a brother-poet says:
But let him rail; for when I give a feast,
Am I to please the cook, or please the guest?

Book i. Ep. 34.

Her father dead, alone no grief she knows;
Th' obedient tear at ev'ry visit flows.
No mourner he who must by praise be fee'd;
But he who mourns in secret, mourns indeed!

Book i. Ep. 39.

The verses, friend, which thou hast read, are
mine;
But, as thou read'st them, they may pass for thine.

Book ii. Ep. 3.

You say, you nothing owe; and so I say:
He only owes, who something has to pay.

Book ii. Ep. 58.

You're fine, and ridicule my thread-bare gown:
Thread-bare indeed it is; but 'tis my own.

I DROPP'D a thing in verse, without a name;
I felt no censure, and I gain'd no fame:
The public saw the bastard in the cradle,
But ne'er inquir'd; so left it to the beadle.
A certain nobleman takes up the child;
The real father lay perdue, and smil'd.
The public now enlarges ev'ry grace:
What shining eyes it has! how fair a face!
Of parts what symmetry! what strength divine!
The noble brat is sure of Pelops' line.

The Mistake. TAYLOR.

A CANNON-BALL, one bloody day,
Took a poor sailor's leg away;
And, as on comrade's back he made off,
A second fairly took his head off.
The fellow, on this odd emergence,
Carries him pick-back to the surgeon's.
Z——ds! cries the doctor, are you drunk,
To bring me here a headless trunk?
A lying dog! cries Jack—he said
His leg was off, and not his head.

An Epitaph to the Memory of Lucy Lyttelton.

MADE to engage all hearts, and charm all
eyes;
Tho' meek, magnanimous; tho' witty, wise;
Polite as all her life in courts had been,
Yet good as she the world had never seen;
The noble fire of an exalted mind,
With gentle female tenderness combin'd;
Her speech was the melodious voice of love;
Her song the warbling of the vernal grove;
Her eloquence was sweeter than her song,
Soft as her heart, and as her reason strong;
Her form each beauty of her mind express'd;
Her mind was virtue by the graces dress'd.

Epitaph on Miss Stanley. THOMSON.

HERE, Stanley! rest, escap'd this mortal strife,
Above the joys, beyond the woes of life.
Fierce pangs no more thy lively beauty stain,
And sternly try thee with a year of pain:
No more sweet patience, feigning oft relief,
Lights thy sick eye, to cheat a parent's grief:
With tender art to save her anxious groan,
No more thy bosom presses down its own:
Now well-earn'd peace is thine, and bliss sincere:
Ours be the lenient, not unpleasing tear!
O! born to bloom, then sink beneath the
storm,
To show us Virtue in her fairest form;
To show us artless Reason's moral reign,
What boastful Science arrogates in vain;
Th' obedient passions, knowing each their part,
Calm light the head, and harmony the heart!
Yes, we must follow soon, will glad obey,
When a few suns have roll'd their cares away;
Tir'd with vain life, will close the willing eye;
'Tis the great birthright of mankind to die.
Blest be the bark that wafts us to the shore
Where death-divided friends shall part no
more!
To join thee there, here with thy dust repose,
Is all the hope thy hapless mother knows.

To Atossa.

I LOV'D thee beautiful and kind,
And plighted an eternal vow;
So alter'd are thy face and mind,
'Twere perjury to love thee now.

To Corinna.

SINCE first you knew my am'rous smart,
Each day augments your proud disdain;
'Twas then enough to break my heart,
And now, thank Heaven! to break my chain.
Cease, thou scorner, cease to shun me!
Now let love and hatred cease!
Half that rigour had undone me,
All that rigour gives me peace.

My heart still hovering round about you,
I thought I could not live without you:
Now we have liv'd three months asunder,
How I liv'd with you is the wonder.

Dialogue between an old Incumbent and the Person promised the next Presentation.

I'm glad to see you well.—O faithless breath!
What, glad to see me well, and wish my death!
No more, replies the youth, Sir, this misgiving:
I wish not for your death, but for your living!

To Chloe.

I SWORE I lov'd, and you believ'd,
Yet, trust me, we were both deceiv'd;
Though all I swore was true.
I lov'd one gen'rous, good, and kind,
A form created in my mind;
And thought that form was you.

On one who first abused, and then made Love to a Lady.

FOUL — with graceless verse
The noble — dar'd asperse:
But when he saw her well bespatter'd,
Her reputation stain'd and tatter'd;
He gazed, and loved the hideous elf,
She look'd so very like himself.
True sung the bard well-known to fame*,
Self-love and social are the same.

To a Lady who drew her Pins from her Bonnet in a Thunder Storm.

CEASE, Eliza, thy locks to despoil,
Nor remove the bright steel from thy hair;
For fruitless and fond is the toil,
Since Nature has made thee so fair.
While the rose on thy cheek shall remain,
And thine eye so bewitchingly shine,
Thy endeavour must still be in vain,
For attraction will always be thine.

SHE who in secret yields her heart,
Again may claim it from her lover;
But she who plays the trifler's part,
Can ne'er her squander'd fame recover.
Then grant the boon for which I pray;
'Tis better lend than throw away.

WE thought you without titles great,
And wealthy with a small estate;
While by your humble self alone
You seem'd unrated and unknown.
But now on fortune's swelling tide
High borne in all the pomp of pride,
Of grandeur vain, and fond of pelf,
'Tis plain, my lord, you knew yourself.

TOM thought a wild profusion great,
And therefore spent his whole estate:
Will thinks the wealthy are ador'd,
And gleans what misers blush to hoard:
Their passions merit fate the same,
They thirst and starve alike for fame.

To Clarissa.

WHY like a tyrant wilt thou reign,
When thou mayst rule the willing mind?
Can the poor pride of giving pain
Repay the joys that wait the kind?

* Mr. Pope.

I curse my fond enduring heart,
Which, scorn'd, presumes not to be free:
Condemn'd to feel a double smart;
To hate myself, and burn for thee.

On Shakspeare's Monument at Stratford upon Avon.

SEWARD.

GREAT Homer's birth seven rival cities claim,
Too mighty such monopoly of fame.
Yet not to birth alone did Homer owe
His wondrous worth: what Egypt could bestow,
With all the schools of Greece and Asia join'd,
Enlarg'd th' immense expansion of his mind.
Nor yet unrival'd the Mæonian strain:
The British Eagle† and the Mantuan Swan
Tow'r equal heights. But happier Stratford, thou,
With uncontested laurels deck thy brow:
Thy bard was thine unschool'd, and from thee
brought
More than all Egypt, Greece, or Asia, taught.
Not Homer's self such matchless honors won;
The Greek has rivals, but thy Shakspeare none.

A Sonnet. Imitated from the Spanish of Lopez de Vega: Menagiana, tom. iv. p. 176.

EDWARDS.

CAPRICIOUS Wray a sonnet needs must have;
I ne'er was so put to't before—a sonnet!
Why, fourteen verses must be spent upon it:
'Tis good howe'er t' have conquer'd the first stave.
Yet I shall ne'er find rhymes enough by half,
Said I; and found myself i' the midst o' the second:
If twice four verses were but fairly reckon'd,
I should turn back on the hardest part and laugh.
Thus far with good success I think I've scribbled,
And of the twice seven lines have clean got o'er ten.
Courage! another'll finish the first triplet.
Thanks to thee, muse, my work begins to shorten.
There's thirteen lines got thro', dribblet by dribblet:
'Tis done! count how you will, I warr'nt
there's fourteen.

ON pollard oak, hollow at heart,
Tremendous lightning darted:
Tremble at God's avenging dart,
O all ye hollow-hearted!

Why the Universities abound in Learning.

No wonder that Oxford and Cambridge profound,
In learning and science so greatly abound;
When all carry thither a little each day,
And we meet with so few who bring any away.

† Milton.

As Quin and Foote
One day walk'd out
To view the country round,
In merry mood
They chatting stood
Hard by the village-pound.
Foote from his poke
A shilling took,
And said, I'll bet a penny
In a short space,
Within this place,
I'll make this piece a guinea.
Upon the ground,
Within the pound,
The shilling soon was thrown:
Behold, says Foote,
The thing's made out,
For there is one pcund one.
I wonder not,
Says Quin, that thought
Should in your head be found,
Since that's the way
Your debts you pay—
One shilling in the pound.

On a Statue of Apollo crowning Merit.

MERIT, if thou'rt blest with riches,
For God's sake buy a pair of breeches,
And give them to thy naked brother,
For one good turn deserves another.

O LET me die in peace! Eumenes cried
To a hard creditor at his bed-side.
How! die! roar'd Gripus; thus your debts evade!
No, no, Sir, you shan't die till I am paid.

On Sleep.

ALTHOUGH soft sleep death's sad resemblance wears,
Still do I wish him on my couch to lie.
Come, balmy sleep; for sweetly it appears,
Thus without life to live, thus without death to die.

On a bad Singer.

When screech-owls screek, their note portends
To foolish mortals death of friends:
But when Corvina strains her throat,
Even screech-owls sicken at the note.

UPON some hasty errand Tom was sent,
And met his parish-curate as he went;
But, just like what he was, a sorry clown,
It seems he pass'd him with a cover'd crown.

The gownman stopp'd, and, turning, sternly said—
I doubt, my lad, you're far worse taught than
fed!
Why, ay! says Tom, still jogging on, that's
true:
Thank God! he feeds me; but I'm taught by
you.

Epitaph on a certain Miser.

HERE lies one who for med'cines would not give
A little gold, and so his life he lost:
I fancy now he'd wish again to livé,
Could he but guess how much his funeral
cost.

On Captain Grenville. LORD LYTTLTON.

YE weeping muses, graces, virtues, tell,
If, since your all-accomplish'd Sidney fell,
You, or afflicted Britain, e'er deplor'd
A loss like that these plaintive lays record!
Such spotless honor; such ingenuous truth;
Such ripen'd wisdom in the bloom of youth!
So mild, so gentle, so compos'd a mind,
To such heroic warmth and courage join'd!
He too, like Sidney, nurs'd in Learning's arms,
For nobler war forsook her softer charms:
Like him, possess'd of every pleasing art,
The secret wish of every female heart;
Like him, cut off in youthful glory's pride,
He unrepining for his country died.

Designed for the Monument of Sir Isaac Newton.

MORE than his name were less—'twould
seem to fear
He who increased Heaven's fame, could want it here.
Yes—when the sun he lighted up shall fade,
And all the world he found at first decay'd;
Then void and waste eternity shall lie,
And Time and Newton's name together die!

Upon a young Gentleman refusing to walk with the Author in the Park, because he was not dressed well. GARRICK.

FRIEND Col and I, both full of whim,
To shun each other oft agree;
For I'm not beau enough for him,
And he's too much a beau for me.
Then let us from each other fly,
And arm in arm no more appear;
That I may ne'er offend your eye,
That you may ne'er offend my ear.

On Mr. Quin. GARRICK.

SAYS Epicure Quin, Should the devil in hell
In fishing for men take delight,
His hook bait with ven'son, I love it so well,
Indeed I am sure I should bite.

Extempore, on hearing a certain impertinent Address in the Newspapers. By Garrick, Thomson, &c.

THOU essence of dock, of valerian, and sage,
At once the disgrace and the pest of this age,
The worst that we wish thee, for all thy bad crimes,
Is to take thy own physic, and read thy own rhymes.

Answer to the Junto.

THEIR wish must be in form revers'd,
To suit the doctor's crimes,
For, if he takes his physic first,
He'll never read his rhymes.

Dr. Hill's Reply to the Junto's Epigram.

YE desperate junto, ye great or ye small,
Who combat dukes, doctors, the deuce, and 'em all!
Whether gentlemen, scribblers, or poets in jail,
Your impertinent curses shall never prevail:
I'll take neither sage, dock, nor balsam of honey;
Do you take the physic, and I'll take the money.

Written soon after Dr. Hill's Farce, called the Rout, was acted. GARRICK.

FOR physic and farces
His equal there scarce is;
His farces are physic,
His physic a farce is.

To Dr. Hill, upon his Petition of the Letter I to Mr. Garrick. GARRICK.

IF 'tis true, as you say, that I've injur'd a letter, [better;
I'll change my note soon, and I hope for the
May the right use of letters, as well as of men,
Hereafter be fixed by the tongue and the pen;
Most devoutly I wish they both had their due,
And that I may be never mistaken for U.

*Colloquial Epigram.* GARRICK.*

Wilmot.

You should call at his house, or should send him a card;—
Can Garrick alone be so cold?

Garrick.

Shall I, a poor player, and still poorer bard,
Shall folly with Camden make bold?
What joy can I give him, dear Wilmot, declare:
Promotion no honors can bring;
To him the Great Seals are but labor and care:
Wish joy to your country and king.

To the Author of the Farmer's Letters, which were written in Ireland in the year of the Rebellion, by Henry Brooke, Esq. 1745. GARRICK.

O THOU, whose artless, free-born genius charms,
Whose rustic zeal each patriot bosom warms;
Pursue the glorious task, the pleasing toil,
Forsake the field, and till a nobler soil;
Extend the farmer's care to human kind,
Manure the heart, and cultivate the mind:
There plant religion, reason, freedom, truth,
And sow the seeds of virtue in our youth:
Let no rank weeds corrupt or brambles choke;
And shake the vermin from the British oak:
From northern blasts protect the vernal bloom,
And guard our pastures from the wolves of Rome:
On Britain's liberty ingraft thy name,
And reap the harvest of immortal fame!

Upon a Lady's Embroidery. GARRICK.

ARACHNE once, as poets tell,
A goddess at her art defied;
But soon the daring mortal fell
The hapless victim of her pride.
O then beware Arachne's fate!
Be prudent, Chloe, and submit:
For you'll more surely feel her hate,
Who rival both her art and wit.

Death and the Doctor. Occasioned by a Physician's lampooning a Friend of the Author. GARRICK.

As Doctor — musing sat,
Death saw, and came without delay;
Enters the room, begins the chat,
With "Doctor, why so thoughtful, pray?"
The Doctor started from his place,
But soon they more familiar grew;
And then he told his piteous case,
How trade was low, and friends were few.
"Away with fear," the phantom said,
As soon as he had heard his tale:
"Take my advice, and mend your trade:
We both are losers if you fail.
"Go write, your wit in satire show,
No matter whether smart or true;
Call — names, the greatest foe
To dullness, folly, pride, and you.
"Then copies spread, there lies the trick,
Among your friends be sure you send 'em;
For all who read will soon grow sick:
And, when you're call'd upon, attend 'em.

* Soon after the promotion of Lord Camden to the Seals, Mr. Wilmot, his Lordship's purse-bearer, called at Hampton; where learning that Mr. Garrick had not yet paid his congratulatory compliments, the conversation between the two gentlemen furnished Mr. Garrick with the subject of the Epigram; in which with admirable address our English Roscius has turned an imputed neglect into a very elegant panegyric on that truly patriotic nobleman.

" Thus trade increasing by degrees,
 Doctor, we both shall have our ends ;
 For you are sure to have your fees,
 And I am sure to have your friends."

Upon a certain Lord's giving some Thousand Pounds for a House. GARRICK.

So many thousands for a house,
 For you, of all the world, Lord Mouse !
 A little house would best accord
 With you, my very little lord !
 And then exactly match'd would be
 Your house and hospitality.

Upon seeing Mr. Taylor's Pictures of Bath, and hearing a Connoisseur declare that " they were finely painted for a Gentleman."
 GARRICK.

TELL me the meaning, you who can,
 Of " finely for a gentleman !"
 Is genius, rarest gift of Heaven,
 To the hired artist only given ?
 Or, like the Catholic salvation,
 Paled in for any class or station ?
 Is it bound prentice to the trade,
 Which works, and as it works is paid ?
 Is there no skill to build, invent,
 Unless inspir'd by five per cent. ?
 And shalt thou, Taylor, paint in vain,
 Unless impell'd by hopes of gain ?
 Be wise, my friend, and take thy fee,
 That Claude Lorraine may yield to thee.

Tom Fool to Mr. Hoskins, his Counsellor and Friend. GARRICK.

ON your care must depend the success of my suit,
 The possession I mean of the house in dispute ;
 Consider, my friend, an attorney's my foe,
 The worst of his tribe, and the best is so-so.
 O let not his quiddits and quirks of the law,
 O let not this harpy, your poor client claw !
 In law, as in life, I know well 'tis a rule,
 That a knave should be ever too hard for a fool :
 To this rule one exception your client implores,
 That the fool may for once beat the knave out of doors.

From the Spanish. GARRICK.

FOR me my fair a wreath has wove,
 Where rival flow'rs in union meet ;
 As oft she kiss'd the gift of love,
 Her breath gave sweetness to the sweet.

A bee within a damask rose
 Had crept, the nectar'd dew to sip ;
 But lesser sweets the thief foregoes,
 And fixes on Louisa's lip ;
 Where tasting all the bloom of spring,
 Waked by the ripening breath of May,
 Th' ungrateful spoiler left his sting,
 And with the honey flew away.

*An Epitaph upon the celebrated Claudius Philips*, Musician, who died very poor.*
 GARRICK.

PHILIPS, whose touch harmonious could remove
 The pangs of guilty pow'r and hapless love,
 Rest here, distress'd by poverty no more,
 Here find that calm thou gav'st so oft before ;
 Sleep undisturb'd within this peaceful shrine,
 Till angels wake thee with a note like thine.

*Epitaph on William Hogarth†, in Chiswick
 Church-Yard.* GARRICK.

FAREWEL, great painter of mankind,
 Who reach'd the noblest point of art ;
 Whose pictur'd morals charm the mind,
 And through the eye correct the heart !
 If genius fire thee, reader, stay ;
 If nature touch thee, drop a tear :—
 If neither move thee, turn away,
 For Hogarth's honour'd dust lies here.

Epitaph on James Quin‡, in Bath Cathedral.
 GARRICK.

THAT tongue, which set the table in a roar,
 And charm'd the public ear, is heard no more :
 Clos'd are those eyes, the harbingers of wit,
 Which spoke, before the tongue, what Shakspeare writ.
 Cold are those hands, which living were stretch'd forth,
 At friendship's call, to succour modest worth.
 Here lies James Quin ! Deign, reader, to be taught,—
 Whate'er thy strength of body, force of thought,
 In nature's happiest mould however cast,
 To this complexion thou must come at last.

Epitaph on Laurence Sterne§. GARRICK.

SHALL pride a heap of sculptur'd marble
 raise, [praise,
 Some worthless, unmourn'd, titled fool to
 And shall we not by one poor grave-stone learn
 Where genius, wit, and humor, sleep with Sterne ?

* This Epitaph has been ascribed to Dr. Johnson, but was really written by Mr. Garrick.
 See European Magazine, January, 1785.

† He died October 26, 1764.

‡ Mr. Quin died January, 1766.

§ Mr. Sterne was born at Clonmel in Ireland, November 24, 1713, and died in London, March 18, 1768.

Epitaph on Mr. Beighton, who had been Vicar of Egham forty-five Years. GARRICK.

NEAR half an age, with every good man's praise,
Among his flock the shepherd pass'd his days :
The friend, the comfort of the sick and poor,
Want never knock'd unheeded at his door ;
Oft when his duty call'd, disease and pain
Strove to confine him, but they strove in vain.
All moan his death, his virtues long they tried,
They knew not how they lov'd him, till he died.

Peculiar blessings did his life attend,
He had no foe, and Camden was his friend.

Epitaph on Paul Whitehead, Esq.

HERE lies a man misfortune could not bend ;
Prais'd as a poet, honor'd as a friend.
Tho' his youth kindled with the love of fame,
Within his bosom glow'd a brighter flame :
Whene'er his friends with sharp affliction bled,
And from the wounded deer the herd was fled,
Whitehead stood forth—the healing balm applied,
Nor quitted their distresses—till he died.

A Tribute by Mr. Garrick, to the Memory of a Character he long knew and respected.

*Epitaph on Mr. Havard, Comedian*.*

“ An honest man's the noblest work of God.”
HAVARD, from sorrow rest beneath this stone ;
An honest man—belov'd as soon as known ;
Howe'er defective in the mimic art,
In real life he justly play'd his part !
The noblest character he acted well,
And heaven applauded when the curtain fell.

Inscription on a Grotto of Shells, at Crux-Easton†, the Work of Nine young Ladies‡. POPE.

HERE, shunning idleness at once and praise,
This radiant pile nine rural sisters raise ;
The glittering emblem of each spotless dame,
Clear as her soul, and shining as her frame ;
Beauty which nature only can impart,
And such a polish as disgraces art ;
But fate dispos'd them in this humble sort,
And hid in deserts what would charm a court.

Verses occasioned by seeing a Grotto built by Nine Sisters. HERBERT.

So much this building entertains my sight,
Nought but the builders can give more delight :
In them the masterpiece of nature's shown,
In this I see art's masterpiece in stone.
O Nature, Nature, thou hast conquer'd Art ;
She charms the sight alone, but you the heart.

Lines written by the celebrated THOMSON, to his AMANDA ; with a Copy of the SEASONS.

ACCEPT, dear Nymph ! a tribute due
To sacred friendship, and to you :
But with it take, what breath'd the whole,
O ! take to thine the Poet's soul !
If fancy here her pow'r displays,
Or if a heart exalts these lays,
You fairest in that fancy shine,
And all that heart is fondly thine !

An Epigram.

A MEMBER of the modern great
Pass'd Sawney with his budget ;
The peer was in a car of state,
The tinker forced to trudge it.
But Sawney shall receive the praise
His lordship would parade for :
One's debtor for his dapple greys,
And th' other's shoes are paid for.

The Lawyer and his Client.

Two lawyers, when a knotty cause was
o'er,
Shook hands, and were as good friends as
before,
“ Zounds !” says the losing client, “ how come yaw
To be such friends, who were such foes just naw ?”
Thou fool, says one, we lawyers, tho' so keen,
Like shears, ne'er cut ourselves, but what's between.

Epitaph on Mrs. Ellen Temple, late Wife of Mr. John Temple, of Malton, Surgeon.

By Mr. GENTLEMAN.

HERE, in just hope above the stars to rise,
The mortal part of Ellen Temple lies,
In whom those beauties of a spotless mind,
Faith and good works, were happily combin'd ;
A patient, careful, constant, loving wife,
The foe of scandal and domestic strife :
The tender mother, undissembling friend,
Who grac'd those virtues with a pious end ;
Who, still preserving an unblemish'd name,
Ne'er meanly strove to taint a neighbour's
fame :
Who play'd,—as, reader, thou shouldst do—her part
With inward peace and rectitude of heart ;
Who Christian-like resign'd her final breath,
And, dying free from censure, smil'd at death.

* He died 20th February, 1778. † In the county of Hants, the seat of Edward Lisle, Esq.

‡ Miss Lises, daughters of Edward Lisle, Esq. and sisters to Dr. Lisle.

Epigram.

SAYS a beau to a lady, Pray name if you
can,
Of all your acquaintance, the handsomest man.
The lady replied, If you'd have me speak true,
He's the handsomest man that's the most unlike you.

On a Bowl of Punch.

WHENE'ER a bowl of punch we make,
Four striking opposites we take;
The strong, the small, the sharp, the sweet,
Together mix'd, most kindly meet;
And when they happily unite,
The bowl "is pregnant with delight."

In conversation thus we find,
That four men, differently inclin'd;
With talents each distinct, and each
Mark'd by peculiar pow'rs of speech;
With tempers too as much the same
As milk and verjuice, frost and flame;
Their parts by properly sustaining,
May all prove highly entertaining.

A Description of London.

HOUSES, churches, mix'd together,
Streets unpleasant in all weather;
Prisons, palaces contiguous,
Gates, a bridge, the Thames irriguous;
Gaudy things enough to tempt ye,
Showy outsides, insides empty;
Bubbles, trades, mechanic arts,
Coaches, wheelbarrows, and carts;
Warrants, bailiffs, bills unpaid,
Lords of laundresses afraid;
Rogues that nightly rob and shoot men,
Hangmen, aldermen, and footmen;
Lawyers, poets, priests, physicians,
Noble, simple, all conditions;
Worth beneath a threadbare cover,
Villainy bedaub'd all over;
Women black, red, fair, and grey;
Prudes, and such as never pray;
Handsome, ugly, noisy, still,
Some that will not, some that will;
Many a beau without a shilling,
Many a widow not unwilling,
Many a bargain if you strike it:
This is London:—how d'ye like it?

On a young Lady.

BEHOLD a nymph with ev'ry virtue graced,
Minerva's head on Venus' shoulders placed!
Kind nature here displays her nicest art,
With sweet relieves hides the soundest heart;
But while it hides, it elegantly tells
With what benevolence her bosom swells;
Here's beauty mental, moral, and divine,
To charm the lover, and his thoughts refine.

Paradox.

FOUR people sat down in one evening to play,
They play'd all that eve, and parted next day;
Could you think, when you're told, as thus they all sat,
No other play'd with them, nor was there one bet;
Yet, when they rose up, each gained a guinea,
Though none of 'em lost to the amount of a penny?

Answer.

Four merry fiddlers play'd all night,
To many a dancing ninny;
And the next morning went away,
And each receiv'd a guinea.

On the Fifth of November.By an Irish Bellman.

TO-NIGHT's the day, I speak it with great sorrow,
That we were all t' have been blown up tomorrow;
Therefore, take care of fire, and candle-light:
'Tis a cold frosty morn, and so good night.

Reflections over a Pipe of Tobacco and a Pinch of Snuff.

WHILST smoke arises from my pipe,
Thus to myself I say:
Why should I anxious be for life,
Which vanishes away?

Our social snuff-boxes convey
The same ideas just;
As if they silently would say,
Let's mingle dust to dust.

A Country Quarter Session.

THREE or four parsons full of October,
Three or four squires between drunk and sober;
Three or four lawyers, three or four liars;
Three or four constables, three or four criers;
Three or four parishes bringing appeals;
Three or four writings, and three or four seals;
Three or four bastards, three or four whores;
Tag, rag, and hobtail, three or four scores;
Three or four statutes misunderstood,
Three or four paupers all praying for food;
Three or four roads that never were mended,
Three or four scolds—and the session is ended.

Epigram.

WHAT legions of fables and whimsical tales
Pass current for gospel where priestcraft prevails!
Our ancestors thus were most strangely deceiv'd;
What stories and nonsense for faith they be-liev'd!

But we, their wise sons, who these fables
reject,
Even truth, now-a-days, are too apt to suspect:
From believing too much, the right faith we let fall,
So now we believe, i'faith, nothing at all.

Another.

CRIES Ned to his neighbours, as onward they
press'd,
Conveying his wife to her place of long rest;
Take, friends, I beseech you, a little more leisure,
For why should we thus make a toil of a pleasure?

On Six Sorts of People who keep Fasts.

THE miser fasts because he will not eat,
The poor man fasts because he has no meat;
The rich man fasts with greedy mind to spare;
The glutton fasts, to eat the greater share;
The hypocrite he fasts to seem more holy,
The righteous man to punish sin and folly.

Epitaph on a Blacksmith.

My sledge and hammer lie declin'd,
My bellows too have lost their wind;
My fire's extinct, my forge decay'd,
My vice is in the dust all laid;
My coal is spent, my iron gone,
My nails are drove, my work is done.
My fire-dried corpse here lies at rest,
My soul, smoke-like, soars to be blest.

A whimsical Epitaph, taken from a Stone in a Church.

HERE lies the body of Sarah Sexton,
Who as a wife did never vex one;
We can't say that for her at th' next stone.

On Quadrille. To a young Lady.

DEIGN, lovely nymph, to hear the least of bards,
Who draws instruction from a game of cards.
What tho' Quadrille perplex you? here is shown
How hard the task for her who plays alone.
But would you then consent to be a wife,
Think first, O think! you play your cards for life!
Should sordid friends control your right good
will,
Beware the wretched state of forced Spadille.
Should man, by grandeur, strive your heart to
fire,
A cross fish well denotes a purse-proud squire.
Then pass by wealth and power; for better sure
It is, with some kind swain to play secure;
And he, dear girl, who does your charms
adore,
Now asks your leave; O! let him soon say more.

To-morrow. An Epigram.

TO-MORROW you will live, you always cry:
In what far country does to-morrow lie,
That 'tis so mighty long ere it arrive?
Beyond the Indies doth this morrow live?
'Tis so far fetch'd, this morrow, that I fear
'Twill be both very old, and very dear.
To-morrow I will live, the fool does say.
To-day's too late: the wise liv'd yesterday.

Spoken extempore by the Earl of Rochester to a Parish Clerk.

STERNHOLD and Hopkins had great qualms,
When they translated David's Psalms,
To make the heart full glad:
But had it been poor David's fate,
To hear thee sing, and them translate,
By Jove, 'twould have made him mad.

Rhyme to Lisbon. By the same.

HERE's a health to Kate,
Our Sovereign's mate,
Of the Royal House of Lisbon:
But the devil take Hyde,
And the Bishop beside
That made her bone of his bone.

On Punch.

HENCE, restless care, and low design!
Hence, foreign compliments and wine;
Let generous Britons, brave and free,
Still boast their punch and honesty.
Life is a bumper, fill'd by fate,
And we the guests who share the treat:
Where strong, insipid, sharp, and sweet,
Each other duly temp'ring, meet.
A while with joy the scene is crown'd,
A while the catch and toast go round;
And when the full carouse is o'er,
Death puffs the lights, and shuts the door.
Say then, physicians of each kind,
Who cure the body or the mind,
What harm in drinking can there be,
Since punch and life so well agree?

The Disappointed Husband.

A SCOLDING wife so long a sleep possess'd,
Her spouse presum'd her soul was now at rest;
Sable was call'd to hang the room with black,
And all their cheer was sugar, rolls, and sack;
Two mourning staffs stood sentry at the door,
And Silence reign'd, who ne'er was there
before;
The cloaks, and tears, and handkerchiefs
prepar'd,
They march'd in woeful pomp to the churchyard,
When, see, of narrow streets what mischiefs
came!
The very dead can't pass in quiet home;
By some rude jolt the coffin lid was broke,
And madam from her dream of death awoke.

Now all was spoil'd! The undertaker's pay,
Sour faces, cakes and wine, quite thrown away.
But some years after, when the former scene
Was acted, and the coffin nail'd again;
The tender husband took especial care
To keep the passage from disturbance clear,
Charging the bearers that they tread aright,
Nor put his dear in such another fright.

Epigram by the Rev. Francis Blackburne, M. A. late Archdeacon of Cleveland.

LYCIDAS to PRUDENTIA.
DESCEND, fair Stoic, from thy flights;
From nature learn to know,
Our passions are the needful weights
That make our virtues go.

PRUDENTIA to LYCIDAS.
True, Lycidas; but think not so
Another truth to shun;
Our passions make our virtues go,
But make our vices run.

An Epigram.

MUSIC's a crotchet the sober thinks vain,
The fiddle's a wooden projection;
Tunes are but flirts of a whimsical brain,
Which the bottle brings best to perfection.
Musicians are half-witted, merry, and mad,
The same are all those that admire 'em;
They're fools if they play unless they're well paid,
And the other are blockheads to hire 'em.

An Epigram.

SAYS Johnny to Paddy, "I can't for my life Conceive how a dumb pair are made man and wife,
"Since they can't with the form and the parson accord."
Says Paddy, "You fool! they take each other's word."

The Biter bit.

A CERTAIN priest had hoarded up
A secret mass of gold;
But where he might bestow it safe,
By fancy was not told.

At last it came into his head
To lock it in a chest
Within the chancel; and he wrote
Thereon, Hic Deus est.

A merry grig, whose greedy mind
Long wish'd for such a prey,
Respecting not the sacred words
That on the casket lay,

Took out the gold; and blotting out
The priest's inscript thereon;
Wrote, Resurrexit, non est hic,
"Your god is ris'n and gone."

On the Death of Dr. Secker, late Archbishop of Canterbury.

WHILE Secker liv'd, he show'd how seers should live;
While Secker taught, heaven open'd to our
eye;
When Secker gave, we knew how angels give;
When Secker died, we knew e'en Saints must die.

Epigram.

Occasioned by the Words "ONE PRIOR." in Burnet's History.

ONE PRIOR!—and is this, this all the fame
The Poet from th' Historian can claim?
No; Prior's verse posterity shall quote,
When 'tis forgot one Burnet ever wrote.

On Content. An Epigram.

It is not youth can give content,
Nor is it wealth's decree;
It is a gift from heaven sent,
Though not to thee or me.
It is not in the monarch's crown,
Though he'd give millions for 't;
It dwells not in his lordship's frown,
Nor waits on him to court.
It is not in a coach and six,
It is not in a garter;
'Tis not in love or politics,
But 'tis in Hodge the carter.

The First Pair.

ADAM alone could not be easy,
So he must have a wife, an' please ye;
And how did he procure this wife,
To cheer his solitary life?
Out of a rib, Sir, from his side,
Was form'd this necessary bride.
But how did he the pain beguile?
How!—he slept sweetly all the while.
And when this rib was re-applied,
In woman's form, to Adam's side,
How then, I pray you, did it answer?—
He never slept so sweet again, Sir.

Similes to Molly.

My passion is as mustard strong;
I sit all sober sad; *
Drunk as a piper all day long,
Or like a March hare mad.
Round as a hoop the bumpers flow,
I drink, yet can't forget her;
For, though as drunk as David's sow,
I love her still the better.
Pert as a pear-monger I'd be,
If Molly were but kind;
Cool as a cucumber could see
The rest of womankind.

Like a stuck pig I gaping stare,
And eye her o'er and o'er;
Lean as a rake with sighs and care,
Sleek as a mouse before.

Plump as a partridge was I known,
And soft as silk my skin;
My cheeks as fat as butter grown;
But as a groat now thin!

I, melancholy as a cat,
Am kept awake to weep;
But she, insensible of that,
Sound as a top can sleep.

Hard is her heart as flint or stone,
She laughs to see me pale;
And merry as a grig is grown,
And brisk as bottled ale.

The god of love at her approach
Is busy as a bee;
Hearts sound as any bell or roach
Are smit, and sigh like me.

Ah me! as thick as hops or hail
The fine men crowd about her;
But soon as dead as a door-nail
Shall I be, if without her.

Straight as my leg her shape appears;
O! were we join'd together,
My heart would be scot-free from cares,
And lighter than a feather.

As fine as fivepence is her mien,
No drum was ever tighter;
Her glance is as a razor keen,
And not the sun is brighter.

As soft as pap her kisses are,
Methinks I taste them yet;
Brown as a berry is her hair,
Her eyes as black as jet.

As smooth as glass, as white as curds,
Her pretty hand invites;
Sharp as a needle are her words,
Her wit like pepper bites.

Brisk as a body-louse she trips,
Clean as a penny drest;
Sweet as a rose her breath and lips,
Round as a globe her breast.

Full as an egg was I with glee,
And happy as a king!
Good Lord! how all men envied me!
She lov'd like any thing:

But false as hell, she like the wind
Chang'd as her sex must do;
Though seeming as the turtle kind,
And like the Gospel true.

If I and Molly could agree,
Let who would take Peru;
Great as an emperor should I be,
And richer than a Jew.

Till you grow tender as a chick,
I'm dull as any post;
Let us like burrs together stick,
And warm as any toast.

You'll find me truer than a die;
And wish me better sped,
Flat as a flounder when I lie,
And as a herring dead.

Sure as a gun she'll drop a tear,
And sigh perhaps, and wish,
When I am rotten as a pear,
And mute as any fish.

On the Word REPRESENTATIVE.

To represent is but to personate,
Which should be truly done at any rate.
Thus they who're fairly chose without a fee,
Should give their votes, no doubt, with liberty,
But when a seat is sold by th' venal tribe,
He represents them best—who takes a bribe.

On the Shortness of Human Life.

LIKE as a damask rose you see,
Or like the blossom on a tree;
Or like the dainty flower in May,
Or like the morning to the day;
Or like the sun, or like the shade,
Or like the gourd which Jonas had;
E'en such is man, whose thread is spun,
Drawn out and cut, and so is done:
Withers the rose, the blossom blasts,
The flower fades, the morning hastes;
The sun doth set, the shadows fly,
The gourd consumes, and mortals die.

Like to the grass that's newly sprung,
Or like a tale that's new begun;
Or like a bird that's here to-day,
Or like the pearled dew of May;
Or like an hour, or like a span,
Or like the singing of a swan;
E'en such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death:
The grass decays, the tale doth end,
The bird is flown, the dew ascends;
The hour is short, the span not long,
The swan's near death, man's life is done.

Like to the bubble in the brook,
Or in a glass much like a look;
Or like the shuttle in the hand,
Or like the writing in the sand;
Or like a thought, or like a dream,
Or like the gliding of the stream;
E'en such is man, who lives by breath,
Is here, now there, in life and death:
The bubble's burst, the look's forgot,
The shuttle's flung, the writing's blot;
The thought is past, the dream is gone,
The water glides, man's life is done.

*Epitaph on Captain Jones,
Who published some marvellous Accounts of his Travels, the Truth of all which he thought proper to testify by affidavit.*

TREAD softly, mortals, o'er the bones
Of the world's wonder, Captain Jones!

Who told his glorious deeds to many,
But never was believ'd by any.
Posterity, let this suffice:
He swore all's true, yet here he lies.

A Portrait from Life.

By DR. SWIFT.

COME sit by my side while this picture I draw:
In chatt'ring a magpie, in pride a jackdaw;
A temper the devil himself could not bridle,
Impertinent mixture of busy and idle;
As rude as a bear, no mule half so crabbed,
She swills like a sow, and she breeds like a rabbit;
A housewife in bed, at table a slattern,
For all an example, for no one a pattern;
Now tell me, friend Thomas*, Ford†, Grattan,† and merry Dan‡,
Has this any likeness to good Madam Sheridan?

An Epigram,

On seeing a young Lady writing Verses with a Hole in her Stocking.

To see a lady of such grace,
With so much sense and such a face,
So slatternly, is shocking:
O! if you would with Venus vie,
Your pen and poetry lay by,
And learn to mend your stocking.

An Epigram.

As Tom was one day deep in chat with his friend,
He gravely advis'd him his manners to mend;
That his morals were bad, he had heard it from many.
They lie, replied Tom, for I never had any.

On Time.

SAY, is there aught that can convey
An image of its transient stay?
'Tis a hand's breadth; 'tis a tale;
'Tis a vessel under sail;
'Tis a courser's straining steed;
'Tis a shuttle in its speed;
'Tis an eagle in its way,
Darting down upon its prey;
'Tis an arrow in its flight,
Mocking the pursuing sight;
'Tis a vapour in the air;
'Tis a whirlwind rushing there;
'Tis a short-liv'd fading flow'r;
'Tis a rainbow on a show'r;
'Tis a momentary ray
Smiling in a winter's day;
'Tis a torrent's rapid stream;
'Tis a shadow; 'tis a dream;
'Tis the closing watch of night;
Dying at approaching light,

'Tis a landscape vainly gay,
Painted upon crumbling clay;
'Tis a lamp that wastes its fires;
'Tis a smoke that quick expires;
'Tis a bubble, 'tis a sigh:
Be prepar'd, O Man! to die.

An Anatomical Epitaph on an Invalid.

Written by HIMSELF.

HERE lies a head that often ach'd;
Here lie two hands that always shak'd;
Here lies a brain of odd conceit;
Here lies a heart that often beat;
Here lie two eyes that daily wept,
And in the night but seldom slept;
Here lies a tongue that whining talk'd,
Here lie two feet that feebly walk'd;
Here lie the midriff and the breast,
With loads of indigestion prest;
Here lies the liver, full of bile,
That ne'er secreted proper chyle;
Here lie the bowels, human tripes,
Tortur'd with wind and twisting gripes;
Here lies the livid dab, the spleen,
The source of life's sad tragic scene,
That left-side weight that clogs the blood,
And stagnates nature's circling flood;
Here lie the nerves, so often twitch'd
With painful cramps and poignant stitch;
Here lies the back, oft rack'd with pains,
Corroding kidneys, loins, and reins;
Here lies the skin by scurvy fed,
With pimples and eruptions red;
Here lies the man, from top to toe,
That fabric fram'd for pain and woe.

A Poem,

By Sir WALTER RALEIGH.

SHALL I like an hermit dwell
On a rock or in a cell,
Calling home the smallest part
That is missing of my heart,
To bestow it where I may
Meet a rival ev'ry day?
If she undervalue me,
What care I how fair she be?

Were her tresses angel-gold;
If a stranger may be bold,
Unrebuked, unafraid,
To convert them to a brayde,
And, with little more ado,
Work them into bracelets too;
If the mine be grown so free,
What care I how rich it be?

Were her hands as rich a prize
As her hair, or precious eyes;
If she laid them out to take
Kisses, for good manners' sake,
And let ev'ry lover skip
From her hand unto her lip;
If she seem not chaste to me,
What care I how chaste she be?

* Dr. Sheridan.

† The Dean's friends.

‡ Mr. D. Jackson.

No; she must be perfect snow
In effect, as well as show;
Warming but as snow-balls do,
Not like fire by burning too;
But when she by change hath got
To her heart a second lot,
Then, if others share with me,
Farewell her, whate'er she be!

A Poem,

Occasioned by the foregoing.

PAINT, paint no more, no more with blots,
Or chequer so thy face with spots,
That I must view thee, as men strive
To see eclipses, through a sieve;
Be thou but pleasing unto me,
What care I what else thou be?

Be thou fatter than a hog,
A butcher's doublet, or his dog;
Be thy cheeks butter, thy nose grease;
May we make brewis on thy face;
Yet if thou do not melt to me,
What care I how fat thou be?

Be thy nose like fiery coals,
Or a grater, full of holes,
Let it turn up, or else hook in,
And so be clasp'd unto thy chin;
Yet, if it turn not unto me,
What care I how crook'd it be?

Though reading, thou must look so close,
As thou wert reading with thy nose;
From thine eyes let filth run more
Than broken boil, or plaguy sore;
Yet if they do not look on me,
What care I how foul they be?

Canst thou outscold a butter wench,
Or a fresh lawyer at the bench;
Canst thou the noise of thunder drown,
Sour all the beer about the town?
Yet, if thou wilt not speak to me,
What care I how loud thou be?

Be thy mouth like jaws of death,
That they who kiss, must kiss thy teeth;
And hold by th' handle of thy chin,
Lest their foot slip, and they fall in;
Yet, if thou wilt not gape on me,
What care I how broad it be?

Smells thy breath like nurse's clout,
Or a candle just burnt out;
Or so, that men mistake the place,
And untruss, coming near thy face!
Yet, if it smell not so to me,
What care I how strong it be?

Women, like paper, whilst they're white,
Are fit for every man to write;
I'd have a mistress such a one,
I might be sure she was my own;
Be thou then but such to me,
What care I what else thou be?

The Stage Coach.

RESOLV'D to visit a far-distant friend,
A porter to the Bull-and-Gate I send,
And bid the slave at all events engage
Some place or other in the Chester stage.
The slave returns—'tis done as soon as said—
Your honor's sure when once the money's paid—
My brother whip, impatient of delay,
Puts to at three, and swears he cannot stay;
(Four dismal hours ere the break of day.)
Rous'd from sound sleep, thrice call'd, at length
I rise, [eyes;
Yawning, stretch out my arms, half close my
By steps and lanthorn enter the machine,
And take my place, how cordially! between
Two aged matrons of excessive bulk,
To mend the matter too, of meaner folk;
While in like mode jamm'd in on th' other side
A bullying captain and a fair one ride;
Foolish as fair, and in whose lap a boy—
Our plague eternal, but her only joy;
At last, the glorious number to complete,
Steps in my landlord for that bodkin seat:
When soon, by ev'ry hillock, rut, and stone,
Into each other's face by turns we're thrown;
This grannam scolds, that coughs, and captain swears,
The fair one screams, and has a thousand fears;
While our plump landlord, train'd in other lore,
Slumbers at ease, nor yet asham'd to snore;
And master Dicky, on his mother's lap,
Squalling brings up at once three meals of pap.
Sweet company! next time, I do protest, Sir,
I'll walk to Dublin, ere I ride to Chester.

Mr. Garrick being asked by a Nobleman if he did not intend to sit in Parliament, gave him an Answer in the following Lines:

MORE than content with what my talents
gain,
Of public favor though a little vain,
Yet not so vain my mind, so madly bent,
To wish to play the fool in Parliament;
In each dramatic unity to err,
Mistaking time, and place, and character.
Were it my fate to quit the mimic art,
I'd "strut and fret" no more in any part;
No more in public scenes would I engage,
Or wear the cap and mask on any stage.

The Thought; or, a Song of Similes.

I've thought, the fair Narcissa cries,
What is it like, Sir?—"Like your eyes—"
'Tis like a chair—'tis like a key—
'Tis like a purge—'tis like a flea—
'Tis like a beggar—like the sun—
'Tis like the Dutch—'tis like the moon—
'Tis like a kilderkin of ale—
'Tis like a doctor—like a whale—"
Why are my eyes, Sir, like a SWORD?
For that's the Thought, upon my word.

“ Ah! witness every pang I feel,
 The deaths they give the likeness tell.
 A sword is like a chair, you'll find,
 Because 'tis most on end behind.
 'Tis like a key, for 'twill undo one;
 'Tis like a purge, for 'twill run through one;
 'Tis like a flea, and reason good,
 'Tis often drawing human blood.”
 Why like a beggar?—“ You shall hear;
 'Tis often carried 'fore the May'r.
 'Tis like the sun, because 'tis gilt,
 Besides it travels in a belt.
 'Tis like the Dutch we plainly see,
 Because that state, whenever we
 A push for our own int'rest make,
 Does instantly our sides forsake.”
 The moon?—“ Why, when all's said and done,
 A sword is very like the moon;
 For if his Majesty (God bless him),
 When Country Sheriff comes t' address him,
 Is pleas'd his favors to bestow
 On him, before him kneeling low,
 This o'er his shoulders glitters bright,
 And gives the glory to the Knight (night).
 'Tis like a kilderkin, no doubt,
 For 'tis not long in drawing out.
 'Tis like a doctor, for who will Dispute a doctor's power to kill?”
 But why a Sword is like a whale
 Is no such easy thing to tell.
 “ But since all Swords are Swords, d'ye see,
 Why, let it then a backsword be;
 Which, if well us'd, will seldom fail
 To raise up somewhat like a whale.”

The Astronomer's Room.

ONE day I call'd, and Philo out,
 I op'd the door, and look'd about;
 When, all his goods being full in view,
 I took this inventory true:—
Item. A bed without a curtain;
 A broken jar to empty dirt in;
 A candlestick, a greasy night-cap,
 A spitting-pot to catch what might hap;
 Two stockings darn'd with numerous stitches,
 A piece of shirt, a pair of breeches;
 A three-legg'd stool, a four-legg'd table,
 Were fill'd with books unfit for rabble;
 Sines, tangents, secants, radius, co-sines,
 Subtangents, segments, and all those signs;
 Enough to show the man that made 'em
 Was full as mad as he who read 'em:
 An almanack of six years standing,
 A cup with ink, and one with sand in;
 One corner held his books and chest,
 And round the floor were strew'd the rest;
 That all things might be like himself,
 He'd neither closet, drawer, or shelf,
 Here piss-pot, sauce-pot, broken platter,
 Appear'd like het'rogenous matter.
 In ancient days the walls were white,
 But who 'gainst damps and snails can fight?
 They're now in wreathy ringlets bound,
 Some square, some oval, and some round;
 The antiquarian there may find
 Each hieroglyphic to his mind;

Such faces there might fancy trace,
 As never yet knew time or place;
 And he who studies maps or plans,
 Has all the work done to his hands;
 In short, the room, the goods and author,
 Appear'd to be one made for t' other.

Epitaph by a Gentleman to the Memory of a Lady.

FAREWELL, my best-belov'd, whose heavenly
 mind,
 Genius and virtue, strength with softness join'd;
 Devotion undebas'd by pride or art,
 With meek simplicity, and joy of heart;
 Though sprightly, gentle; though polite, sin-
 And only of thyself a judge severe; [cere;
 Unblam'd, unequall'd in each sphere of life,
 The tenderest daughter, sister, parent, wife.
 In thee their patroness the afflicted lost,
 Thy friends, their pattern, ornamental boast;
 And I—but ah! can words my loss declare,
 Or paint th' extremes of transport and despair?
 O thou beyond what verse or speech can tell,
 My guide, my friend, my best-belov'd, farewell!

On seeing a great Commander effeminately dressed at a Ball.

'TIS said that our soldiers so lazy are grown,
 With pleasure and plenty undone,
 That they more for their carriage than courage
 are known,
 And scarce know the use of a gun. [galls,
 Let them say what they will, since it nobody
 And exclaim out still louder and louder;
 But there ne'er was more money expended in balls,
 Or a greater consumption of powder.

An original Epitaph.

HERE lies fast asleep, awake me who can,
 That medley of passions and follies, a Man,
 Who sometimes lov'd licence, and sometimes restraint,
 Too much of the sinner, too little of saint;
 From quarter to quarter I shifted my tack;
 'Gainst the evils of life a most notable quack;
 But, alas! I soon found the defects of my skill,
 And my nostrums in practice prov'd treacherous
 still;
 From life's certain ills 'twas in vain to seek ease,
 The remedy oft prov'd another disease;
 What in rapture began often ended in sorrow,
 And the pleasure to-day brought reflection tomorrow;
 When each action was o'er, and its errors were seen,
 Then I view'd with surprise the strange thing
 I had been;
 My body and mind were so oddly contriv'd,
 That at each other's failing both parties conniv'd;
 Imprudence of mind brought on sickness and pain,
 The body diseas'd paid the debt back again:

Thus coupled together life's journey they pass'd,
Till they wrangled and jangled, and parted at
last ;

Thus tir'd and weary, I've finished my course,
And glad it is bed-time, and things are no worse.

Epitaph on an honest Sailor.

WHETHER sailor or not, for a moment avast !
Poor Tom's mizen top-sail is laid to the mast ;
He'll never turn out, or more heave the lead ;
He's now all aback, nor will sails shoot ahead ;
He ever was brisk, and, and though now gone
to wreck, [upon deck.
When he hears the last whistle he'll jump

The Consultation.

THREE Doctors, met in consultation,
Proceed with great deliberation ;
The case was desperate, all agreed,
But what of that ? they must be fee'd ;
They write then, as 'twas fit they should,
But for their own, not patient's good ;
Consulting wisely, don't mistake, Sir,
Not what to give, but what to take, Sir.

On a Landlord drunk.

LANDLORD, with thee now even is the wine ; [thine.
For thou hast pierc'd his hogs-head, and he

A Rhapsody.

As I walk'd by myself, I said to myself,
And myself said again to me ;
Look to thyself, take care of thyself,
For nobody cares for thee.
Then I said to myself, and thus answer'd myself,
With the self-same repartee ;
Look to thyself, or look not to thy thyself,
'Tis the self-same thing to me.

To-day and To-morrow.

TO-DAY man's dress'd in gold and silver
bright,
Wrapp'd in a shroud before to-morrow night ;
To-day he's feeding on delicious food,
To-morrow dead, unable to do good ;
To-day he's nice, and scorns to feed on crumbs,
To-morrow he's himself a dish for worms ;
To-day he's honor'd, and in vast esteem,
To-morrow not a beggar values him ;
To-day he rises from the velvet bed,
To-morrow lies in one that's made of lead ;
To-day his house, though large, he thinks but
small,
To-morrow, no command, no house at all ;
To-day has forty servants at his gate,
To-morrow scorn'd, not one of them will wait ;
To-day perfum'd as sweet as any rose,
To-morrow stinks in every body's nose ;
To-day he's grand, majestic, all delight,
Ghastful and pale before to-morrow night :
True, as the Scriptures says, "man's life's a span,"
The present moment is the life of man.

An Inscription over a Gentleman's Chimney-Piece near Barnsley.

To my best my friends are free ;
Free with that, and free with me ;
Free to pass the harmless joke,
And the tube sedately smoke ;
Free to drink just what they please,
As at home, and at their ease ;
Free to speak, and free to think—
No informers with me drink ;
Free to stay a night, or so ;
When uneasy, free to go.

The Character.

AN easy mien, engaging in address, [press,
Looks which at once each winning grace ex-
A life where love and truth are ever join'd,
A nature ever great and ever kind,
A wisdom solid, and a judgement clear,
The smile indulgent, and a soul sincere ;
Meek without meanness, gentle and humane ;
Fond of improving, but yet never vain ;
So justly good, so faithful to his friend,
Ever obliging, cautious to offend ;
A mind where gen'rous pity stands confess'd,
Ready to ease and succour the distress'd :
If these respect and admiration raise,
They surely must demand our greatest praise ;
In one bright view th'accomplish'd youth we see,
These virtues all are thine—and thou art he.

Poverty and Poetry.

'Twas sung of old, how one Amphion
Could by his verses tame a lion,
And by his strange enchanting tunes
Make bears and wolves dance rigadoons ;
His songs could call the timber down,
And form it into house or town.
But it is plain, now in these times,
No house is rais'd by poets' rhymes ;
They for themselves can only rear
A few old castles in the air.

Poor are the Brethren of the Bays,
Down from high strains to ekes and ayes :
The muses too are virgins yet,
And may be till they portions get.
Yet still the doating rhymers dream,
And sings of Helicon's bright streams :
But Helicon, for all his clatter,
Yields nothing but insipid water !
Yet, even athirst, he sweetly sings
Of Nectar and Elysian springs.
The grave physician, who by physic,
Like death, dispatches him that is sick,
Pursues a sure and thriving trade ;
Though patients die, the doctor's paid :
Licens'd to kill, he gains a palace
For what another mounts a gallows.

In shady groves the muses play,
And love in flow'ry meads to stray ;
Pleas'd with a bleaky barren ground,
Where rip'ning fruits are never found.

But then, some say, you purchase fame,
And gain a never-dying name;
Great recompense for real trouble,
To be rewarded with a bubble!

Thus soldiers, who in many battles
Get bangs and blows, and God knows what
Are paid with fame and wooden leg, [else,
And gain a pass, with leave to beg.

On Bribery.

A poor man once a judge besought
To judge aright his cause;
And with a pot of oil salutes
The judger of the laws.

My friend, quoth he, thy cause is good;
He glad away did trudge:
Anon his wealthy foe did come
Before this partial judge.

A hog well-fed this churl presents,
And craves a strain of law;
The hog receiv'd, the poor man's right
Was judg'd not worth a straw.

Therewith he cried, O partial judge,
Thy doom has me undone;
When oil I gave, my cause was good,
But now to ruin run.

Poor man, quoth he, I thee forgot,
And see thy cause of foil;
A hog came since into my house,
And broke thy pot of oil.

Queen Elizabeth being asked her Opinion concerning the real Presence in the Sacrament, gave the following artful and solid Answer:

CHRIST was the word that spake it;
He took the bread and brake it;
And what the word did make it,
That I believe, and take it.

Epigram.

It blew a hard storm, and in utmost confusion,
The sailors all hurried to get absolution;
Which done, and the weight of the sins they confess'd
Transferr'd, as they thought, from themselves to the priest,
To lighten the ship, and conclude their devotion, [ocean.
They toss'd the poor parson souse into the

Epigram.

KIND Peggy kiss'd her husband with these words: [thee!"
"Mine own sweet Will, how dearly I love
If true, quoth Will, the world none such affords;
And that 'tis true I dare her warrant be:
For ne'er was woman yet, or good or ill,
But loved always best her own sweet will.

Dialogue between Harry, who had a large Library, and Dick, who had more Understanding than Books.

QUOTH Harry to his friend one day,
"Would, Richard, I'd thy head!"
"What wilt thou give for't?" Dick replied.
The bargain's quickly made."
"My head and all my books I'd give,
With readiness and freedom."
"I'd take thy books, but with thy head, Gadzooks! I ne'er could read them."

Epitaph on a Cobbler.

DEATH at a cobbler's door oft made a stand,
And always found him on the mending hand;
At last came Death, in very dirty weather,
And ripp'd the sole from off the upper-leather.
Death put a trick upon him, and what was't?
The cobbler call'd for's awl, Death brought his last.

True Benevolence.

THE other day, says Ned to Joe,
Near Bedlam's confines groping,
"Whene'er I hear the cries of woe,
My hand is always open."
"I own," says Joe, "that to the poor,
(You prove it ev'ry minute)
Your hand is open, to be sure,
But then there's nothing in it."

Written under a Lady's Name in a Window.

THREE brilliants fair Celinda grac'd
(There love's artillery lies:)
One from her snowy finger blaz'd,
Two sparkled in her eyes.

The first, which shone with fainter rays,
Could here her name impart;
The others drew her charming face
More deeply on my heart.

On the Death of Dean Swift.

WHEN Gay breath'd his last, we in silence complain'd,
But yet we'd a Pope and a Swift who remain'd;
Pope falls! all Parnassus resounds with our cries,
And pray'rs daily made to keep Swift from the skies:
Vain wishes! vain pray'rs! to the wind they are given,
For death comes relentless, and takes him to heaven.
At little misfortunes we're soberly sad,
But it's time, now we've lost all our wits, to run mad.

Magni stat Nominis Umbra. BISHOP.

PROUD as a peer, poor as a bard,
A footsome Spaniard late one night
Knock'd at a tavern-door so hard,
It rous'd the family in a fright.

Up sprung the host from his bed-side,
 Open the chamber-window flew:
 "Who's there? What boisterous hand," he
 "Makes at my gate this loud ado?" [cried,
 "Here is," the stately Spaniard said,
 "Don Lopez, Rodriguez, Alonzo,
 Pedrillo, Gusman, Alvarade,
 Jago, Miguel, Alphonso,
 Antonio, Diego"—"Hold! hold! hold!"
 Exclaim'd the landlord, "pray forbear!
 For half the numbers you have told,
 I have not half a bed to spare."
 "Sir!" quoth the Don, "'tis your mistake,
 If names for men of course you count:
 Though long th' illustrious list I make,
 In me still centres all th' amount.
 Worn down with tramping many a mile,
 Don Lopez, Rodriguez, Pedrillo,
 With all the et-ceteras of his style,
 Will sleep upon a single pillow."

Quod petis hic est.

A THOUSAND objects of desire
 On foreign coasts you'll view;
 Now art, now Nature's works admire,
 Here splendor, there virtù.
 But blessings, which at home you see,
 Sublimer joy suggest:
 Old England gives you liberty,
 And that gives—all the rest.

Stat sua cuique Dies.

To Childermas day some object,
 Some Friday deem a bad day;
 But Will, by no such notions check'd,
 Lets no day be a sad day.
 More cheerful still, as more in debt,
 He makes each day a May-day;
 Nor would he ever fear or fret,
 But for that queer day, pay-day.

French Cooking.

To make a plum-pudding a French count once took
 An authentic receipt from an English lord's cook; [spice,
 Mix suet, milk, eggs, sugar, meal, fruit and
 Of such numbers, such measure, and weight,
 and such price;
 Drop a spoonful of brandy to quicken the mess,
 And boil it for so many hours, more or less.
 These directions were tried, but when tried,
 had no good in,
 'Twas all wash, and all squash, but 'twas not English pudding;
 And monsieur, in a pet, sent a second request
 For the cook that prescrib'd, to assist when
 'twas drest,
 Who, of course, to comply with his honor's
 beseeching,

Like an old cook of Colbrook, march'd into the kitchen.
 The French cooks, when they saw him, talk'd loud and talk'd long,
 They were sure all was right, he could find nothing wrong;
 Till, just as the mixture was rais'd to the pot,
 "Hold your hands! hold your hands!" scream'd
 astonish'd John Trot:
 "Don't you see you want one thing, like fools as you are?"
 "Vone ting, Sare! Vat ting, Sare?"—"A pudding-cloth, Sare!"

Quod petis hic est.

No plate had John and Joan to hoard,
 Plain folk in humble plight;
 One only tankard crown'd their board,
 And that was fill'd each night:
 Along whose inner bottom, sketch'd
 In pride of chubby grace,
 Some rude engraver's hand had etch'd
 A baby's angel-face.
 John swallow'd first a moderate sup;
 But Joan was not like John;
 For when her lips once touch'd the cup,
 She swill'd till all was gone.
 John often urg'd her to drink fair,
 But she ne'er chang'd a jot;
 She lov'd to see the angel there,
 And therefore drain'd the pot.
 When John found all remonstrance vain,
 Another card he play'd;
 And where the angel stood so plain,
 He got a devil portray'd.
 Joan saw the horns, Joan saw the tail,
 Yet Joan as stoutly quaff'd;
 And ever as she seiz'd her ale,
 She clear'd it at a drought.
 John star'd, with wonder petrify'd,
 His hair stood on his pate;
 And "Why dost guzzle now," he cried,
 "At this enormous rate?"
 "Oh! John," she said, "am I to blame?
 I can't, in conscience, stop:
 For sure 'twould be a burning shame
 To leave the Devil a drop!"

The Decanter.

O THOU, that high thy head dost bear,
 With round smooth neck, and simple ear,
 With well-turn'd narrow mouth, from whence
 Flow streams of noblest eloquence:
 'Tis thou that fir'st the bard divine,
 Sacred to Phœbus and the nine;
 That mirth and soft delight canst move
 Sacred to Venus and to Love;
 Yet, spite of all thy virtues rare,
 Thou'rt not a boon companion fair;
 Thou'rt full of wine when thirsty I,
 And when I'm drunk, then thou art dry.

CURIO, whose hat a nimble knave had snatch'd,
Fat, clumsy, gouty, and asthmatic, old,
Panting against a post, his noddle scratch'd,
And his sad story to a stranger told:—

“Follow the thief,” replied the stander-by;
“Ah, sir!” said he, “these legs will wag
no more.”

“Alarm the neighbourhood with a hue and cry.” [roar.]

“Alas, I’ve roar’d as long as lungs could

“Then,” quoth the stranger, “vain is all endeavour,

Sans voice to call, sans vigor to pursue;
And since your hat, of course, is gone for ever,
I’ll e’en make bold to take your wig—adieu!”

How to make Fools scarce.

MANKIND, though satirists with jobations
weary us,

Has only two weak parts, if fairly reckon’d;
The first of which is, trifling with things serious,
And seriousness in trifles is the second.

Remove these little rubs, whoe’er knows how,
And fools will be as scarce as wise men now.

Mental Optics.

To a noted optician, a simple grave man
In these terms his address for assistance began:

“If with me, like my neighbours, you think
’twould succeed,

I would purchase a glass that would help me
to read.”

Number this, number that, no effect could produce,

Concave, and convex, are alike of no use;
The shop was all rummag’d for old ware and
new,

But nothing came of it, for nothing would do.

“’Tis strange,” said the artist, “you see none
the better;

Cannot all these varieties show you a letter?”

“Show a letter?” quoth he, “yes, by hundreds they show ’em,

I can see fast enough: what I want is, to know
’em.”

On Howard’s dying in Russia.

THOUGH far from Britain, Britain’s worthiest pride, [died,

The world’s great patriot, generous Howard

Let not our sorrow blame his wish to roam:
With such a heart, as such a life display’d;

A heart, which all mankind one family made;
To travel was but to enlarge his home!

Magna est Veritas et prævalebit.

FALSEHOOD and Truth, in rival race,
Eternal contrast prove;

Falsehood speeds on with rapid pace,

Truth scarce appears to move.

Falsehood finds numbers in her course,
Who prompt assistance lend;
Ill-nature loves to aid her force,
And Folly stands her friend.

Guilt, Envy, Cunning, all make shift
To help her on her way,
And Fortune gives her many a lift,
No matter for foul play.

Yet, after all her efforts tried,
And all her circuit run,
When Time the vict’ry shall decide,
She’ll end where Truth begun!

Virtue indigenous in England.

VIRTUES and fashions jointly share
All England’s pride, all England’s care;
From foreign fops, and coxcomb courts,
Fashions by wholesale she imports;
But let it to her praise be known,
Old England’s virtues are her own!

Fati valet Hora benigna.

WHEN Tom call’d in, one day, on Ned,
His wife was plastering dearee’s head,
Who sigh’d, but dar’d not shake it!
’Tis well Tom’s pace is something slower,
For had he come an hour before,
He’d seen the vixen break it.

Brevis esse laboro.

ON folly’s lips eternal tattlings dwell;
Wisdom speaks little, but that little well;
So lengthening shades the sun’s decline betray,
But shorter shadows mark meridian day.

On a Cobweb.

BY never-failing cunning taught,
Her arts the spider plies;
And ambush’d in the web she wrought,
A fell assassin lies.

By never-ceasing rashness led,
The fly pursues his way;
Bolts on the snare his heedless head,
A self-devoted prey.

Nature and Instinct.

HATCHED from alien eggs, along the meads,
The jocund hen a troop of ducklings leads:
But when the dangers of the pool they brave,
And plunge intrepid in the dreadful wave,
High beats her fluttering heart, she calls, she cries,

And restless, round and round the margin flies;
Alike unalter’d nature’s powers occur,
Instinct in them, parental care in her:
The offspring’s deed proclaims a race unknown,
A mother’s feelings prove the brood her own.

*Latin Learning of little Use*.*

YOUR venerable chaplain once,
(Though now with age he bend)
Train'd here the scholar, lash'd the dunce,
A master and a friend.

To profit by his well-known care,
His child a butcher brought;
And all the needful to prepare,
A dictionary bought.

Before a week its course had run,
The butcher came again:
"Take back your book, give back my son,"
He cried with might and main.

"Larning!" 'tis money thrown away,
Such larning to procure;
The book don't show, the boy can't say,
What's Latin—for a skewer."

More's meant than meets the Ear.

WHEN doctors, twenty years ago,
Wore wigs of venerable flow,
A bodkin-sword's diminutive stump,
Stuck right across each physic rump;
Whose short dimensions seem'd to say,
"Our object is to save, not slay."
An emblem apt enough, I trow:
But wicked wits pretend to show,
For swords so small, an apter still,
"We've other ways than one to kill."

Nothing new under the Sun.

THERE'S nothing new beneath the sun,
So ancient wits' decisions run:
But wit no match for facts is;
For I know things, and so do you,
Though everlasting, ever new!
What think you, Sirs, of taxes?

Ancient and Modern Poets distinguished.

"TWIXT those poets of old, and our poets of late,
One perpetual distinction holds true:
The new, in a twinkling, are all out of date,
The old—will for ever be new!

The Power of Verse.

READ! read! the thread-bare poet cries,
New powers of verse I bring:
At every line new beauties rise
Spontaneous while I sing!
Poet! thy boast would seem more true,
One fact if thou couldst quote;
Had powers and beauties all so new
Procur'd thee—a new coat!

* Spoken at Merchant Taylors' School.

The Progress of Wigs.

WHEN Charles the First the sceptre bore,
Each grave divine, I trow,
A silken cap all sable wore,
With nine straight hairs below.

The Restoration's jovial day
Chang'd, with the men, the mode,
And orth'dox heads, in broad display,
The flaxen buckle show'd.

In Anna's reign, from general view
Th' enormous flaxens fled:
And lo! perukes of milk-white hue
Succeeded in their stead.

These too incurr'd, by lapse of years,
Disuse, though not disgrace;
New clerical brows requir'd new gears,
And grizzles took their place.

Yet still the wig's full form retain'd
The feather'd foretop's peak:
Yet still the solemn bush remain'd
To flank the rosy cheek.

But now! forgive the conscious muse,
That feels her verse too bold:
What fashions modern reverends use,
You need not here be told.

Though new their taste, while they adopt
Their good forefathers' ways;
The frizz'd, the curl'd, the bald, the cropt,
Have all their claim to praise.

The Effect of Pulpit Eloquence.

A VETERAN gambler, in a tempest caught,
Once in his life a church's shelter sought,
Where many a hint pathetically gave,
On life's precarious lot the preacher gave.
The sermon ended, and the storm all spent,
Home trudg'd old Cog-die, reasoning as he went. [declar'd,
"Strict truth," quoth he, "this rev'rend sage
I feel conviction, and will be prepar'd;
Nor e'er henceforth, since life thus steals away,
Give credit for a bet—beyond a day!"

Case in the Constitutional Court.

A FARMER, as records report,
Most hugely discontented,
His vicar at the Bishop's Court
For gross neglect presented.
"Our former priest, my Lord," he said,
"Each Sunday the year round,
Some Greek in his discourses read,
And charming was the sound!
Not such our present parson's phrase,
No Greek does he apply;
But says in English all he says,
As you might speak, or I.
And yet for this so simple style,
He claims each tithe and due;
Pigs, pippins, poultry, all the while,
And Easter off-rings too!"

"You're skill'd in languages, I guess,"
 Th' amaz'd diocesan cry'd:
 "I know no language, more nor less,"
 The surly clown reply'd:
 "But Greek, I've heard the learned say,
 Surpasses all the rest;
 And since 'tis for the best we pay,
 We ought to have the best."

All not Gold that glitters.

WHY sleeps, benumb'd, the conscious mind,
 When social good craves virtue's zeal;
 Whoe'er can benefit mankind,
 Is Heav'n's trustee, for human weal.
 To hide true worth from public view,
 Is burying diamonds in their mine:
 All is not gold that shines, 'tis true;
 But all that is gold—ought to shine!

On Hope. ANON.

HOPE, heav'n-born cherub, still appears,
 Howe'er misfortune seems to lower:
 Her smile the threat'ning tempest clears,
 And is the rainbow of the shower.

A LONG way off Lucinda strikes the men;
 As she draws near,
 And one sees clear,
 A long way off—one wishes her again.

On a Person not celebrated for his Veracity.

On Tuesday next, says Tom to Ned,
 I'll dine with you and take a bed.
 You may believe him, Will replies,
 Where'er Tom dines he always LIES.

On Two beautiful Sisters who were drowned at Sea.

WHAT to the faithless ocean now is due?
 It gave one Venus, and has taken two!

On a natural Grotto, near a deep Stream.

HEALTH, rose-lipp'd cherub, haunts this spot,
 She slumbers oft in yonder nook:
 If in the shade you find her not,
 Plunge—and you'll find her in the brook!

On a Lady who beat her Husband.

COME hither, Sir George, my picture is here,
 What think you, my love? don't it strike you?
 "I can't say it does, just at present, my dear,
 But I think it soon will, it's so like you."

What is an Epigram.

WHAT is an epigram? a dwarfish whole:
 Its body brevity, and wit its soul.

By Mr. P. DODD.

JOE hates a hypocrite. It shows
 Self-love is not a fault of Joe's.

To a living Author.

YOUR comedy I've read, my friend,
 And like the half you pilfer'd best;
 But sure the piece you yet may mend:
 Take courage, man! and steal the rest.

Imitated from the French.

By Mr. P. DODD.

HIS last great debt is paid—poor Tom's no
 more,
 Last debt? Tom never paid a debt before.

By THEOPHILUS SWIFT, Esq.

The rooted aversion entertained by the late Judge Robinson, of the King's Bench, in Ireland, to the volunteers of that country, in the year 1780, is well known. The following epigram was occasioned by a circumstance that actually took place about that period in the court where he was then sitting.

"THAT soldier so rude, he swaggers in scarlet;
 Put him out of the court; I'll imprison the varlet."
 "A soldier I'm not," quoth the hero in red;
 "No soldier, my Lord, but an officer I,
 A captain who carries his sword on his thigh."
 Stern Robinson then, with sarcastical sneer,
 Roll'd his sharp-eagle eye on the vain volunteer,
 And, "Tipstaff," he cried, as the captain grew bolder,
 "Out, out with that officer who is no soldier."

Bargains.

NED's thrifty spouse, her taste to please,
 With rival dames at auctions vies;
 Is charm'd with ev'ry thing she sees,
 And ev'ry thing she sees she buys.
 Ned feels at ev'ry sale enchanted,
 Such costly wares! so wisely sought!
 Bought because they may be wanted,
 Wanted because they may be bought.

A Question and an Answer.

JACK drinks fine wines, wears modish clothing,
 But, prithee, where lies Jack's estate?—
 In Algebra, for there I found of late
 A quantity call'd less than nothing.

On a ready Writer.

JEM writes his verses with more speed
 Than the printer's boy can set 'em.
 Quite as fast as we can read,
 And only not so fast as we forget 'em.

WHAT! rise again with all one's bones?
 Quoth Giles; I hope you fib:
 I 'trusted when I went to heaven,
 To go without my rib.

On a bad Singer.

SWANS sing before they die—'twere no bad thing
 Should certain persons die before they sing.

On a modern Dramatist.

NOT for the stage his plays are fit,
 But suit the closet, said a wit.
 The closet? said his friend, I ween
 The water-closet 'tis you mean.

From the Greek.

NOT twice three years I told, when fate
 Snatch'd me from my mother's breast;
 O weep not, reader! for if short my date,
 Short are my sorrows, long my rest.

From the Greek.

BUT five years old—sweet babe, adieu!
 Beneath thy sod repose;
 Little of life poor Henry knew,
 Yet 'scap'd from all its woes.

From the Greek.

BUSY, thoughtless, playful, I,
 Little dreaming danger nigh,
 Was plac'd, ere twice three years had gone,
 By cruel death, beneath this stone.
 Yet weep not, weep not, parents dear,
 No pains nor cares shall enter here;
 If little of life's joys I knew,
 So little of its sorrows too.

From the Greek.

To the happy and prosperous life's but a span,
 So quickly the years pass away;
 To the wretched, forsaken, disease-tortur'd
 An age is involv'd in a day. [man,

From the Greek.

BLAME not love, as fraught with care,
 Cease, ye lovers, thus to moan;
 Light and Joy Love's daughters are,
 The Woes from Folly spring alone.

Spoken extempore to a Lady, on being asked what this World was like.

THIS world is a prison in ev'ry respect,
 Whose walls are the heavens in common;
 The gaoler is sin, and the prisoners men,
 And the fetters are nothing but—woman.

The Thief.

I tell, with equal truth and grief,
 That little Kitt's an arrant thief.
 Before the urchin well could go,
 She stole the whiteness of the snow;
 And more—that whiteness to adorn,
 She stole the blushes of the morn;
 Stole all the softness Æther pours
 On primrose buds, in vernal show'rs.
 There's no repeating all her wiles:
 She stole the Graces' winning smiles;
 'Twas quickly seen she robb'd the sky,
 To plant a star in either eye;
 She pilfer'd orient pearl for teeth,
 And stole the cow's ambrosial breath;
 The cherry, steep'd in morning dew,
 Gave moisture to her lips and hue.

These were her infant spoils; a store
 To which, in time, she added more:
 At twelve she stole from Cyprus' Queen
 Her air and love-commanding mien;
 Stole Juno's dignity; and stole,
 From Pallas, sense to charm the soul;
 She sung—amaz'd the Syrens heard,
 And to assert their voice appear'd;
 She play'd—the Muses from their hill
 Wonder'd who thus had stole their skill;
 Apollo's wit was next her prey,
 And then rise beams that light the day;
 While Jove, her pilfering threats to crown,
 Pronounc'd these beauties all her own,
 Pardon'd her crimes, and prais'd her art;
 And t' other day she stole my heart.

Cupid! if lovers are thy care,
 Revenge thy votary on the fair;
 Do justice on her stolen charms,
 And let her prison be—my arms.

Beauty's Value. SHAKESPEARE.

BEAUTY is but a vain, a fleeting good,
 A shining gloss that fadeth suddenly;
 A flow'r that dies when almost in the bud,
 A brittle glass that breaketh presently.
 A fleeting good, a gloss, a glass, a flow'r,
 Lost, faded, broken, dead, within an hour.
 As goods when lost we know are seldom found,
 As fading gloss no rubbing can excite;
 As flow'rs when dead are trampled on the
 ground,
 As broken glass no cement can unite;
 So beauty, blemish'd once, is ever lost,
 In spite of physic, painting, pains, and cost.

On the frequent Defeats of the French Army in the last War. An Epigram. 1760.

THE toast of each Briton in war's dread alarms,
 O'er bottle or bowl, is success to our arms.
 Attack'd, put to flight, and soon forc'd from each trench,
 Success to our legs is the toast of the French.

Epitaph on a Scolding Wife.

HERE lies my wife; poor Molly! let her lie:
 She finds repose at last—and so do I.

A Sailor having been sentenced to the Cat o' Nine Tails, when tied ready for Punishment, spoke the following Lines to his Commander, who had an aversion to a Cat.

By your honor's command, an example I stand
Of your justice to all the ship's crew;
I am hamper'd and stript, and if I am whipt,
'Tis no more than I own is my due.

In this scurvy condition, I humbly petition
To offer some lines to your eye:
Merry Tom by such trash once avoided the lash,
And, if fate and you please, so may I.
There is nothing you hate, I'm inform'd, like a cat;

Why, your honor's aversion is mine:
If puss then with one tail can make your heart fail,

O save me from that which has nine!
N. B. He was pardoned.

On a certain Lady's Study.

To Chloe's study shall we go?
(For ladies have their studies now.)
O what a splendid sight is there!
'Twould make the dullest hermit stare:
There stand, all rang'd in proud array,
Each French romance, and modern play;
Love's magazine of flames and darts,
Whole histories of eyes and hearts:
But O! view well the outward scene,
You'll never need to look within;
What Chloe loves she plainly shows,
For, lo! her very books are beaus.

An Epigram.

THE lofty oak from a small acorn grows,
And to the skies ascends with spreading boughs;
As years increase, it shades th' extended plain,
Then big with death and vengeance ploughs
the main:
Hence rises fame, and safety to our shore;
And from an acorn springs Britannia's pow'r.

The Modern Courtier.

PRAY say what's that which smirking trips
this way.
That powder'd thing, so neat, so trim, so gay,
Adorn'd with tambour'd vest, and spangled
sword;
That supple servile thing?—O! that's a Lord!
You jest—that thing a Peer? an English Peer?
Who ought (with head, estate, and conscience clear)
Either in grave debate, or hardy fight,
Firmly maintain a free-born people's right:
Surely those lords were of another breed
Who met their monarch John at Runnemedes;
And clad in steel, there in a glorious hour
Made the curs'd tyrant feel the people's pow'r;
Made him confess, beneath that awful rod,
Their voice united is the voice of God.

Epitaph on a beautiful and virtuous young Lady.

SLEEP soft in dust, wait the Almighty's will,
Then rise unchang'd, and be an angel still.

An Epitaph on a poor but honest Man.

STOP, reader, here, and deign to look
On one without a name,
Ne'er enter'd in the ample book
Of fortune or of fame.

Studious of peace, he hated strife;
Meek virtues fill'd his breast;
His coat of arms, "a spotless life,"
"An honest heart" his crest.

Quarter'd therewith was innocence,
And thus his motto ran:
"A conscience void of all offence,
Before both God and man."

In the great day of wrath, though pride
Now scorns his pedigree,
Thousands shall wish they'd been allied
To this great family.

An Epitaph on a very idle Fellow.

From CAMDEN.

HERE lieth one that once was born and cried,
Liv'd several years, and then—and then—he died.

The Picture of Slander.

WHAT mortal but Slander, that serpent,
hath stung, [tongue?
Whose teeth are sharp arrows, a razor her
The poison of asps her livid lip loads,
The rattle of snakes with the spittle of toads;
Her throat is an open sepulchre; her legs
Set hatching of vipers, and cockatrice' eggs;
Her sting is a scorpion's; like hyena she'll cry;
With the ear of an adder, a basilisk's eye;
The mouth of a monkey, the hug of a bear,
The chat of a parrot, the head of a hare;
The wing of a magpie, the snout of a hog,
The feet of a mole, and the tail of a dog;
Her claw is a tiger's, her forehead is brass,
With the hiss of a goose, and the bray of an ass.

Epigram to a pretended Friend, and real Enemy.

THY hesitating tongue and doubtful face
Show all thy kindness to be mere grimace.
Throw off the mask; at once be foe or friend;
'Tis base to soothe, when malice is the end;
The rock that's seen gives the poor sailor dread,
But double terror that which hides its head.

On a Tombsone in Essex.

HERE lies the man Richard,
And Mary his wife;
Their surname was Pritchard;
They liv'd without strife;
And the reason was plain:
They abounded in riches;
They no care had nor pain,
And the wife WORE THE BREECHES.

To Lady Mary Wortley Montague.

By MR. POPE.

IN beauty or wit, no mortal as yet
To question your empire has dar'd;
But men of discerning have thought that in learning
To yield to a lady was hard.

Impertinent schools, with musty dull rules,
Have reading to females denied;
So papists refuse the Bible to use,
Lest flocks should be wise as their guide.

'Twas woman at first (indeed she was curst)
In knowledge that tasted delight;
And sages agree, the laws should decree
To the first of possessors the right.

Then bravely, fair dame, resume the old claim,
Which to your whole sex does belong:
And let men receive from a second bright Eve
The knowledge of right and of wrong.

But if the first Eve hard doom did receive,
When only one apple had she; [you,
What punishment new shall be found out for
Who, tasting, have robb'd the whole tree?

On the Death of a Wife, a notable Scold and a Shrew. By the Husband.

WE lived one-and-twenty year
As man and wife together;
I could no longer keep her here;
She's gone, I know not whither.

Could I but guess, I do protest,
I speak it not to flatter;
Of all the women in the world
I never would come at her.

Her body is bestowed well,
A handsome grave doth hide her;
And sure, her soul is not in hell,
The devil would ne'er abide her.

I rather think she's soar'd aloft;
For in the last great thunder
Methought I heard her very voice
Rending the clouds in sunder.

The Rose. By MR. PHILIPS.

THE rose's age is but a day,
Its bloom the pledge of its decay;
Sweet in scent, in color bright,
It blows at morn, and fades at night.

Imitated by DR. SWIFT.

My age is not a moment's stay,
My birth the same with my decay;
I savor ill; no color know;
And fade the instant that I blow.

A Boston Epigram—Written in 1774.

To the Ministry.

You've sent a rod to Massachusset,
Thinking the Americans will buss it;
But much I fear for Britain's sake,
That this same rod will prove a snake.

On Matrimony. An Epigram.

TOM prais'd his friend, who chang'd his state,
For binding fast himself and Kate
In union so divine;
"Wedlock's the end of life," he cried.
"Too true, alas!" said Jack, and sigh'd:
" 'Twill be the end of mine."

An Epitaph on the Death of a favorite Parrot that was found in a Necessary-House.

HERE safe lie in-terr'd the remains of a bird,
Who submits to all-conquering fate;
Whose master took care to teach it to swear,
As his mistress had taught it to prate.

If complaint should be made of the place where he's laid,

Poor Betty is only in fault;
Poor Betty, to save the expense of a grave,
Thought proper to choose it a vault.

To preserve its dear fame, for time without
His mistress, still kinder and kinder, [name,
Declar'd with a tear, she'd never come here,
Without leaving something behind her.

Epitaph on Lady Molesworth, who was burnt to Death by a Fire which broke out in her Dwelling-House, London, the 6th of May, 1763.

A PEERLESS matron, pride of female life,
In ev'ry state, as widow, maid, or wife,
Who, wedded to threescore, preserv'd her fame;
She liv'd a phoenix, and expir'd in flame.

Verses supposed to be written by Alexander Selkirk, during his solitary abode in the Island of Juan Fernandez. COWPER.

I AM monarch of all I survey,
My right there is none to dispute;
From the centre all round to the sea,
I am lord of the fowl and the brute.
O solitude! where are the charms
That sages have seen in thy face?
Better dwell in the midst of alarms,
Than reign in this horrible place.

I am out of humanity's reach,
I must finish my journey alone;
Never hear the sweet music of speech,
I start at the sound of my own.
The beasts that roam over the plain
My form with indifference see;
They are so unacquainted with man,
Their tameness is shocking to me.

Society, friendship, and love,
Divinely bestow'd upon man,
O had I the wings of a dove,
How soon would I taste you again!
My sorrows I then might assuage
In the ways of religion and truth,
Might learn from the wisdom of age,
And be cheer'd by the sallies of youth.

Religion! what treasure untold
 Resides in that heavenly word!
 More precious than silver and gold,
 Or all that this earth can afford:
 But the sound of the church-going bell
 These valleys and rocks never heard,
 Ne'er sigh'd at the sound of a knell,
 Or smil'd when a sabbath appear'd.

Ye winds that have made me your sport,
 Convey to this desolate shore
 Some cordial endearing report
 Of a land I shall visit no more.
 My friends do they now and then send
 A wish or a thought after me?
 O tell me I yet have a friend,
 Though a friend I am never to see.

How fleet is a glance of the mind!
 Compar'd with the speed of its flight,
 The tempest itself lags behind,
 And the swift winged arrows of light.
 When I think of my own native land,
 In a moment I seem to be there;
 But, alas! recollection at hand,
 Soon hurries me back to despair.

But the sea-fowl is gone to her nest,
 The beast is laid down in his lair:
 E'en here is a season of rest,
 And I to my cabin repair.
 There is mercy in every place,
 And mercy, encouraging thought!
 Gives even affliction a grace,
 And reconciles man to his lot.

Ode to Peace. COWPER.

COME, peace of mind, delightful guest!
 Return and make thy downy nest
 Once more in this sad heart:
 Nor riches I nor pow'r pursue,
 Nor hold forbidden joys in view,
 We therefore need not part.

Where wilt thou dwell, if not with me,
 From av'rice and ambition free,
 And pleasure's fatal wiles?
 For whom, alas! dost thou prepare
 The sweets that I was wont to share,
 The banquet of thy smiles?

The great, the gay, shall they partake
 The heaven that thou alone canst make?
 And wilt thou quit the stream
 That murmurs through the dewy mead,
 The grove and the sequester'd shed,
 To be a guest with them?

For thee I planted, thee I priz'd,
 For thee I gladly sacrific'd
 Whate'er I lov'd before;
 And shall I see thee start away,
 And helpless, hopeless, hear thee say,
 Farewell! we meet no more?

Human Frailty. COWPER.

WEAK and irresolute is man;
 The purpose of to-day,
 Woven with pains into his plan,
 To-morrow rends away.

The bow well bent, and smart the spring,
 Vice seems already slain;
 But passion rudely snaps the string,
 And it revives again.

Some foe to his upright intent
 Finds out his weaker part;
 Virtue engages his assent,
 But pleasure wins his heart.

'Tis here the folly of the wise
 Through all his art we view;
 And while his tongue the charge denies,
 His conscience owns it true.

Bound on a voyage of awful length,
 And dangers little known,
 A stranger to superior strength,
 Man vainly trusts his own.

But oars alone can ne'er prevail
 To reach the distant coast;
 The breath of heaven must swell the sail,
 Or all the toil is lost.

On observing some Names of little Note recorded in the Biographia Britannica.

COWPER.

O FOND attempt to give a deathless lot
 To names ignoble, born to be forgot!
 In vain recorded in historic page,
 They court the notice of a future age:
 Those twinkling tiny lustres of the land
 Drop one by one from fame's neglecting hand!
 Lethæan gulfs receive them as they fall,
 And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all.

So when a child, as playful children use,
 Has burnt to tinder a stale last-year's news,
 The flame extinct, he views the roving fire:
 There goes my lady, and there goes the squire;
 There goes the parson, O illustrious spark!
 And there, scarce less illustrious, goes the clerk.

The Nightingale and Glow-Worm. COWPER.

A NIGHTINGALE, that all day long
 Had cheer'd the village with his song,
 Nor yet at eve his note suspended,
 Nor yet when even-tide was ended,
 Began to feel, as well he might,
 The keen demands of appetite;
 When looking eagerly around,
 He spied far off, upon the ground,
 A something shining in the dark,
 And knew the glow-worm by his spark:
 So, stooping down from hawthorn top,
 He thought to put him in his crop.
 The worm, aware of his intent,
 Harangu'd him thus, right eloquent:

Did you admire my lamp, quoth he,
 As much as I your minstrelsy,
 You would abhor to do me wrong,
 As much as I to spoil your song;
 For 'twas the self-same Pow'r divine
 Taught you to sing, and me to shine,

That you with music, I with light,
Might beautify and cheer the night.
The songster heard his short oration,
And, warbling out his approbation,
Releas'd him, as my story tells,
And found a supper somewhere else.

Hence jarring sectaries may learn
Their real interest to discern :
That brother should not war with brother,
And worry and devour each other,
But sing and shine by sweet consent,
Till life's poor transient night is spent,
Respecting in each other's case
The gifts of nature and of grace.

Those Christians best deserve the name
Who studiously make peace their aim ;
Peace, both the duty and the prize
Of him that creeps, and him that flies.

On a Goldfinch starved to Death in his Cage.
COWPER.

TIME was when I was free as air,
The thistle's downy seed my fare,
My drink the morning dew ;
I perch'd at will on ev'ry spray,
My form genteel, my plumage gay,
My strains for ever new.

But gaudy plumage, sprightly strain,
And form genteel, were all in vain,
And of a transient date ;
For caught and cag'd, and starv'd to death,
In dying sighs my little breath
Soon pass'd the wiry grate.

Thanks, gentle swain, for all my woes,
And thanks for this effectual close
And cure for every ill !
More cruelty could none express ;
And I, if you had shown me less,
Had been your prisoner still.

The Pine-apple and the Bee.
COWPER.

THE pine-apples in triple row
Were basking hot and all in blow :
A bee of most discerning taste
Perceiv'd the fragrance as he pass'd.
On eager wing the spoiler came,
And search'd for crannies in the frame ;
Urg'd his attempt on ev'ry side,
To ev'ry pane his trunk applied ;
But still in vain, the frame was tight,
And only pervious to the light.
Thus having wasted half the day,
He trimm'd his flight another way.

Methinks, I said, in thee I find
The sin and madness of mankind ;
To joys forbidden man aspires,
Consumes his soul with vain desires ;
Folly the spring of his pursuit,
And disappointment all the fruit.
While Cynthio ogles as she passes
The nymph between two chariot-glasses,
She is the pine-apple, and he
The silly unsuccessful bee.

The maid who views with pensive air
The show-glass fraught with glitt'ring ware,
Sees watches, bracelets, rings, and lockets,
But sighs at thought of empty pockets ;
Like thine her appetite is keen,
But, ah, the cruel glass between !

Our dear delights are often such,
Expos'd to view, but not to touch ;
The sight our foolish heart inflames ;
We long for pine-apples in frames.
With hopeless wish one looks and lingers,
One breaks the glass and cuts his fingers ;
But they whom truth and wisdom lead,
Can gather honey from a weed.

The Poet, the Oyster, and Sensitive Plant.
COWPER.

AN Oyster cast upon the shore
Was heard, though never heard before,
Complaining in a speech well worded,
And worthy thus to be recorded :

Ah, hapless wretch ! condemn'd to dwell
For ever in my native shell,
Ordain'd to move when others please,
Not for my own content or ease,
But toss'd and buffeted about,
Now in the water, and now out.
'Twere better to be born a stone
Of ruder shape and feeling none,
Than with a tenderness like mine,
And sensibility so fine :
I envy that unfeeling shrub,
Fast-rooted against ev'ry rub.

The plant he meant grew not far off,
And felt the sneer with scorn enough ;
Was hurt, disgusted, mortified,
And with asperity replied.

(When, cry the botanists, and stare,
Did plants call'd sensitive grow there ?
No matter when, a poet's muse is
To make them grow where just she chooses).

You shapeless nothing in a dish,
You that are but almost a fish,
I scorn your coarse insinuation,
And have most plentiful occasion
To wish myself the rock I view,
Or such another dolt as you.
For many a grave and learned clerk,
And many a gay unletter'd spark,
With curious touch examines me,
If I can feel as well as he ;
And when I bend, retire, and shrink,
Says, " Well, 'tis more than one would think."
Thus life is spent, O fie upon't !
In being touch'd, and crying, " Don't !"

A poet, in his evening walk,
O'erheard, and check'd, this idle talk.
And, " Your fine sense, he said, and yours,
Whatever evil it endures,
Deserves not, if so soon offended,
Much to be pitied or commended.
Disputes, though short, are far too long,
Where both alike are in the wrong ;
Your feelings, in their full amount,
Are all upon your own account.

" You, in your grotto-work enclos'd,
Complain of being thus expos'd,
Yet nothing feel in that rough coat,
Save when the knife is at your throat :
Wherever driven by wind or tide,
Exempt from ev'ry ill beside.

" And as for you, my Lady Squeamish,
Who reckon ev'ry touch a blemish,
If all the plants that can be found
Embellishing the scene around
Should droop and wither where they grow,
You would not feel at all, not you.
The noblest minds their virtue prove
By pity, sympathy, and love.
These, these are feelings truly fine,
And prove their owner half divine."

His censure reach'd them as he dealt it,
And each by shrinking show'd he felt it.

A Fable. COWPER.

A RAVEN, while with glassy breast
Her new-laid eggs she fondly press'd,
And on her wicker-work high mounted
Her chickens prematurely counted
(A fault philosophers might blame,
If quite exempted from the same),
Enjoy'd at ease the genial day ;
'Twas April, as the bumkins say,
The legislature call'd it May.
But suddenly a wind, as high
As ever swept a winter sky
Shook the young leaves about her ears,
And fill'd her with a thousand fears,
Lest the rude blast should snap the bough,
And spread her golden hopes below.
But just at eve the blowing weather,
And all her fears, were hush'd together :
And now, quoth poor unthinking Ralph,
'Tis over, and the brood is safe ;
(For ravens, though as birds of omen
They teach both conj'rors and old women
To tell us what is to befall,
Can't prophesy themselves at all.)
The morning came, when neighbour Hodge,
Who long had mark'd her airy lodge,
And destin'd all the treasure there
A gift to his expecting fair,
Climb'd like a squirrel to his prey,
And bore the worthless prize away.

MORAL.

'Tis Providence alone secures,
In ev'ry change, both mine and yours.
Safety consists not in escape
From dangers of a frightful shape :
An earthquake may be bid to spare
The man that's strangled by a hair.
Fate steals along with silent tread,
Found oft'nest in what least we dread,
Frowns in the storm with angry brow,
And in the sunshine strikes the blow.

The Love of the World detected. COWPER.

THUS says the prophet of the Turk :
" Good Mussulman, abstain from pork ;

There is a part in ev'ry swine
No friend or follower of mine
May taste, whate'er his inclination,
On pain of excommunication."
Such Mahomet's mysterious charge,
And thus he left the point at large.
Had he the sinful part express'd,
They might with safety eat the rest :
But for one piece, they thought it hard
From the whole hog to be debarr'd,
And set their wit at work to find
What joint the prophet had in mind.
Much controversy straight arose,
These choose the back, the belly those ;
By some 'tis confidently said
He meant not to forbid the head ;
While others at that doctrine rail,
And piously prefer the tail :
Thus, conscience freed from ev'ry clog,
Mahometans eat up the hog.

You laugh—'tis well ; the tale applied,
May make you laugh on t' other side.
Renounce the world, the preacher cries :
We do, a multitude replies.
While one as innocent regards
A snug and friendly game at cards ;
And one, whatever you may say,
Can see no evil in a play ;
Some love a concert, or a race,
And others, shooting, and the chase.
Revil'd and lov'd, renounc'd and follow'd,
Thus bit by bit the world is swallow'd :
Each thinks his neighbour makes too free,
Yet likes a slice as well as he :
With sophistry their sauce they sweeten,
Till quite from tail to snout 'tis eaten.

The Jackdaw. COWPER.

THERE is a bird who by his coat,
And by the hoarseness of his note,
Might be suppos'd a crow ;
A great frequenter of the church,
Where bishop-like he finds a perch
And dormitory too.

About the steeple shines a plate,
That turns and turns, to indicate
From what point blows the weather ;
Look up, your brains begin to swim ;
'Tis in the clouds : that pleases him,
He chooses it the rather.

Fond of the speculative height,
Thither he wings his airy flight,
And thence securely sees
The bustle and the raree-show
That occupies mankind below,
Secure and at his ease.

You think, no doubt, he sits and muses
On future broken bones and bruises,
If he should chance to fall ;
No, not a single thought like that Employs his philosophic pate,
Or troubles it at all.

He sees that this great round-about,
The world, with all its motley rout,
Church, army, physic, law,
Its customs and its businesses
Are no concern at all of his,
And says—What says he? Caw.

Thrice happy bird! I too have seen
Much of the vanities of men,
And, sick of having seen 'em,
Would cheerfully these limbs resign
For such a pair of wings as thine,
And such a head between 'em.

The Country Parson's Blessings.

WOULD ye, my friends, live free from care,
Attentive lend a willing ear;
While I in humble verse relate
The blessings of my humble state.

I have a living brings in clear
About a hundred pounds a year;
The tithe well paid, without law-strife.
(I'm not encumber'd with a wife).
A single church, not grand, but neat;
My people rather good than great;
A strong-built house, and pasture good,
Where Sorrel crops his livelihood;
A garden cloth'd with greens and fruits,
And intermix'd with flow'ry roots;
A walk with well-mow'd greensward laid,
Where I may smoke in sun or shade;
A terrace rais'd, whence I survey
The market folk that pass that way;
A shaded bench where I may read
Old Baker's Chronicle, or Speed:
The neighb'ring clergy kind and free,
Who give and take civility;
Of humor good, of mirth and sense,
Who o'er a glass some wit dispense;
(For where's the crime to meet and prate
Of country news and tricks of state?)
Some social gems of goodly worth,
Who scorn to boast of wealth or birth;
Who ne'er assume the courtier's frown,
Yet keep above the homely clown;
Who love their country, king, and church,
And in no dues the parson lurch.
With ease I keep a maid and man,
This Harry call'd, the other Nan:
A table sleek, with pudding grac'd,
Or plain or plum, as suits my taste;
Attended by a sav'ry dish
Of mutton, beef, or fowl, or fish;
A pile of salad, fresh and green;
In summer, fruit well pick'd and clean;
Sound sparkling ale, and sometimes wine,
When patron deigns with Vic to dine.
Oft o'er the fields with gun I stride,
And faithful Banter by my side;
Then, if a mushroom is in sight,
It serves to supper me at night;
Or else a fieldfare or a snipe,
Sometimes a dish of double tripe.

Thus joyous do I pass my life,
Stranger to tumult or to strife;

Pleasures I feel in this blest state,
Unfelt, unknown, to rich and great.
When airy fancy mounts on wing,
I think myself a sort of king;
My pipe my sceptre, cup my crown,
My elbow chair my regal throne.

On hearing of a Gentleman's Pocket being picked of his Watch.

HE that a watch would wear, this he must do;
Pocket his watch, and watch his pocket too.

The Happy Fire-Side.

THE hearth was clean, the fire was clear,
The kettle on for tea;
Palemon, in his elbow chair,
As blest as man could be.

Clarinda, who his heart possess'd,
And was his new-made bride,
With head reclin'd upon his breast,
Sat toying by his side.

Stretch'd at his feet, in happy state,
A fav'rite dog was laid;
By whom a little sportive cat
In wanton humor play'd.

Clarinda's hand he gently press'd;
She stole an am'rous kiss,
And, blushing, modestly confess'd
The fulness of her bliss.

Palemon, with a heart elate,
Pray'd to Almighty Jove,
That it might ever be his fate,
Just so to live and love.

Be this eternity, he cried,
And let no more be given;
Continue thus my lov'd fire-side,
I ask no other heaven.

The Retrospect of Life.

RICHES chance may take or give;
Beauty lives a day, and dies;
Honor lulls us while we live;
Mirth's a cheat, and Pleasure flies.

Is there nothing worth our care;
Time, and chance, and death, our foes?
If our joys so fleeting are,
Are we only tied to woes?

Let bright Virtue answer, No;
Her eternal pow'rs prevail,
When honors, riches, cease to flow,
And beauty, mirth, and pleasure fail.

An Invitation to the Country.

THE swallows in their torpid state
Compose their useless wing,
And bees in hives as idly wait
The call of early spring.

The keenest frost that binds the stream,
The wildest wind that blows,
Are neither felt nor fear'd by them,
Secure of their repose.

But man, all-feeling and awake,
The gloomy scene surveys;
With present ills his heart must ache,
And pant for brighter days.

Old Winter, halting o'er the mead,
Bids me and Mary mourn;
But lovely Spring peeps o'er his head,
And whispers your return.

Then April, with her sister May,
Shall chase him from the bow'rs,
And weave fresh garlands ev'ry day,
To crown the smiling Hours.

And if a tear, that speaks regret
Of happier times, appear,
A glimpse of joy that we have met
Shall shine, and dry the tear.

Invitation to the feathered Race. GREAVES.

AGAIN the balmy zephyr blows,
Fresh verdure decks the grove;
Each bird with vernal rapture glows,
And tunes his notes to love.

Ye gentle warblers! hither fly,
And shun the noon-tide heat:
My shrubs a cooling shade supply;
My groves, a safe retreat.

Here, freely hop from spray to spray,
Or weave the mossy nest:
Here, rove and sing the live-long day;
At night, here sweetly rest.

Amid this cool translucent rill
That trickles down the glade,
Here bathe your plumes, here drink your fill,
And revel in the shade.

No school-boy rude, to mischief prone,
E'er shows his ruddy face,
Or twangs his bow, or hurls a stone,
In this sequester'd place.

Hither the vocal thrush repairs;
Secure the linnet sings;
The goldfinch dreads no slimy snares
To clog her painted wings.

Sad Philomel! ah, quit thy haunt
Yon distant woods among,
And round my friendly grotto chant
Thy sweetly plaintive song.

Let not the harmless red-breast fear,
Domestic bird, to come,
And seek a sure asylum here,
With one that loves his home.

My trees for you, ye artless tribe!
Shall store of fruit preserve;
O! let me thus your friendship bribe;
Come, feed without reserve.

For you these cherries I protect,
To you these plums belong;
Sweet is the fruit that you have peck'd,
But sweeter far your song.

Let then this league betwixt us made
Our mutual interests guard:
Mine be the gift of fruit and shade;
Your songs be my reward.

Address to a Nightingale. THOMPSON.

O NIGHTINGALE! best poet of the grove,
That plaintive strain can ne'er belong to thee,
Blest in the full possession of thy love:
O lend that strain, sweet nightingale! to me.

'Tis mine, alas! to mourn my wretched fate;
I love a maid who all my bosom charms,
Yet lose my days without this lovely mate;
Inhuman Fortune keeps her from my arms.

You, happy birds! by nature's simple laws
Lead your soft lives, sustain'd by nature's fare;
You dwell wherever roving fancy draws,
And love and song is all your pleasing care:

But we, vain slaves of int'rest and of pride,
Dare not be blest, lest envious tongues should
blame;

And hence in vain I languish for my bride:
O mourn with me, sweet bird! my hapless
flame.

Retaliation. GOLDSMITH.

The title and nature of this Poem show that it owed its birth to some preceding circumstances of festive merriment, which from the wit of the company and the very ingenious author's peculiar oddities, were probably enlivened by some strokes of humor. This piece was only intended for the Doctor's private amusement, and that of the particular friends who were its subject; and he unfortunately did not live to revise, or even finish it, in the manner which he intended. The public have, however, already shown how much they were pleased with its appearance, even in its present form.

Of old, when Scarron his companions invited,
Each guest brought his dish, and the feast was united;
If our landlord* supplies us with beef and with fish,
Let each guest bring himself, and he brings the best dish:
Our Deant† shall be venison, just fresh from the plains;
Our Burke‡ shall be tongue, with a garnish of brains;
Our Will§ shall be wild-fowl, of excellent flavour;
And Dick|| with his pepper shall heighten their savour:

* The master of the St. James's Coffee-house, where the Doctor and the friends he has characterized in this poem held an occasional club.

† Doctor Barnard, Dean of Derry in Ireland, author of many ingenious pieces.

‡ Mr. Edmund Burke, member for Wendover, and one of the greatest orators in this kingdom.

§ Mr. William Burke, late Secretary to General Conway, and member for Bedwin.

|| Mr. Richard Burke, Collector of Grenada, no less remarkable in the walks of wit and humour, than his brother Edmund Burke is justly distinguished in all the branches of useful and polite literature.

Our Cumberland's* sweet-bread its place shall obtain,
 And Douglas† is pudding substantial and plain;
 Our Garrick's‡ a salad, for in him we see
 Oil, vinegar, sugar, and saltness agree:
 To make out the dinner full certain I am
 That Ridge§ is anchovy and Reynolds|| is lamb,
 That Hickey's¶ a capon: and by the same rule,
 Magnanimous Goldsmith a gooseberry-fool.
 At a dinner so various, at such a repast,
 Who'd not be a glutton, and stick to the last?
 Here, waiter, more wine, let me sit while I'm able,
 Till all my companions sink under the table;
 Then with chaos and blunders encircling my
 head,
 Let me ponder, and tell what I think of the dead.
 Here lies the good Dean, re-united to earth,
 Who mix'd reason with pleasure, and wisdom
 with mirth:
 If he had any faults, he has left us in doubt,
 At least in six weeks I could not find 'em out;
 Yet some have declar'd, and it can't be denied
 'em, [em.
 That sly-boots was cursedly cunning to hide
 Here lies our good Edmund, whose genius was such
 We scarcely can praise it or blame it too much:
 Who, born for the universe, narrow'd his mind, [mankind:
 And to party gave up what was meant for Though fraught with all learning, yet straining his throat [him a vote:
 To persuade Tommy Townshend** to lend
 Who, too deep for his hearers, still went on refining, [of dining;
 And thought of convincing, while they thought
 Though equal to all things, for all things unfit,
 Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit;
 For a patriot too cool; for a drudge disobedient;
 And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient.
 In short, 'twas his fate, unemploy'd or in place,
 Sir,
 To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.
 Here lies honest William, whose heart was a mint, [was in't;
 While the owner ne'er knew half the good that
 The pupil of impulse, it forc'd him along,
 His conduct still right, with his argument wrong;
 Still aiming at honor, yet fearing to roam,
 The coachman was tipsy, the chariot drove home:

Would you ask for his merits, alas! he had none:
 What was good was spontaneous, his faults were his own.

Here lies honest Richard, whose fate I must sigh at,
 Alas, that such frolic should now be so quiet!
 What spirits were his, what wit and what whim,
 Now breaking a jest, and now breaking a limb††; [ball,
 Now wrangling and grumbling to keep up the
 Now teasing and vexing, yet laughing at all!
 In short, so provoking a devil was Dick,
 That we wish'd him full ten times a day at Old
 Nick;

But, missing his mirth and agreeable vein,
 As often we wish'd to have Dick back again.

Here Cumberland lies, having acted his parts,
 The Terence of England, the mender of hearts;
 A flattering painter, who made it his care
 To draw men as they ought to be, not as they are.
 His gallants are all faultless, his women divine,
 And Comedy wonders at being so fine;
 Like a tragedy-queen he has dizen'd her out,
 Or rather like Tragedy giving a rout.

His fools have their follies so lost in a crowd
 Of virtues and feelings, that folly grows proud;
 And coxcombs, alike in their failings alone,
 Adopting his portraits are pleas'd with their own.
 Say, where has our poet this malady caught,
 Or wherefore his characters thus without fault?
 Say, was it, that vainly directing his view
 To find out men's virtues, and finding them few,
 Quite sick of pursuing each troublesome elf,
 He grew lazy at last, and drew from himself?

Here Douglas retires from his toils to relax,
 The scourge of impostors, the terror of quacks.
 Come all ye quack bards, and ye quacking di-vines, [reclines.

Come and dance on the spot where your tyrant
 When Satire and Censure encircled his throne,
 I fear'd for your safety, I fear'd for my own;
 But now he is gone, and we want a detector,
 Our Dodds shall be pious, our Kenricks shall lecture;

Macpherson write bombast, and call it a style;
 Our Townshend make speeches; and I shall compile; [over,

New Lauders and Bowers the Tweed shall cross
 No countryman living their tricks to discover:
 Detection her taper shall quench to a spark,
 And Scotchman meet Scotchman and cheat in the dark.

* Author of the West Indian, Fashionable Lovers, The Brothers, and other dramatic pieces.

† Doctor Douglas, Canon of Windsor, an ingenious Scotch gentleman, who has no less distinguished himself as a citizen of the world, than a sound critic, in detecting several literary mistakes, or rather forgeries, of his countrymen; particularly Lauder on Milton, and Bower's History of the Popes.

‡ David Garrick, Esq. joint Patentee and acting Manager at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane.

§ Counsellor John Ridge, a gentleman belonging to the Irish bar, the relish of whose agreeable and pointed conversation is admitted, by all his acquaintance, to be very properly compared to the above sauce.

|| Sir Joshua Reynolds, President of the Royal Academy.

¶ An eminent Attorney.

** Mr. T. Townshend, member for Whitchurch.

†† Mr. Richard Burke. This gentleman having slightly fractured one of his arms and legs at different times, the Doctor has rallied him on those accidents, as a kind of retributive justice for breaking his jests upon other people.

Here lies David Garrick, describe him who can?

An abridgment of all that was pleasant in man;
As an actor, confess'd without rival to shine;
As a wit, if not first, in the very first line;
Yet with talents like these, and an excellent
heart,

The man had his failings, a dupe to his art;
Like an ill-judging beauty his colors he spread,
And beplaster'd with rouge his own natural red.
On the stage he was natural, simple, affecting;
'Twas only that when he was off he was acting;
With no reason on earth to go out of his way,
He turn'd and he varied full ten times a day;
Though secure of our hearts, yet confoundedly
sick

If they were not his own by finessing and trick;
He cast off his friends as a huntsman his pack,
For he knew when he pleas'd he could whistle
them back. [came,

Of praise a mere glutton, he swallow'd what
And the puff of a dunce he mistook it for fame;
Till his relish grown callous, almost to disease,
Who pepper'd the highest was sure best to please.

But let us be candid, and speak out our mind:
If dunces applauded, he paid them in kind.

Ye Kenricks, ye Kellys, and Woodfalls so grave;
What a commerce was yours, while you got
and you gave! [rais'd,

How did Grub-street re-echo the shouts that you While he was be-Roscius'd, and you were be-prais'd!

But peace to his spirit, wherever it flies,
To act as an angel, and mix with the skies!
Those poets who owe their best fame to his skill,
Shall still be his flatterers, go where he will;
Old Shakspeare receive him with praise and
with love,

And Beaumonts and Bens be his Kellys above.
Here Hickey reclines, a most blunt, pleasant
creature,

And slander itself must allow him good-nature:
He cherish'd his friend, and he relish'd a bumper;
Yet one fault he had, and that one was a thumper.
Perhaps you may ask if the man was a miser?
I answer, No, no, for he always was wiser.

Too courteous, perhaps, or obligingly flat?
His very worst foe can't accuse him of that.

Perhaps he confided in men as they go,
And so was too foolishly honest?—Ah no!
Then what was his failing? come, tell it, and burn ye.

He was, could he help it? a special attorney.

Here Reynolds is laid, and to tell you my mind,
He has not left a wiser or better behind:

His pencil was striking, resistless, and grand;
His manners were gentle, complying, and bland;
Still born to improve us in every part,

The Lamentation of Glumdalclitch for the Loss of Grildrig.

A Pastoral. GAY.

SOON as Glumdalclitch miss'd her pleasing care,
She wept, she blubber'd, and she tore her hair.
No British miss sincerer grief has known,
Her squirrel missing, or her sparrow flown.
She furl'd her sampler, and haul'd in her thread,
And stuck her needle into Grildrig's bed;
Then spread her hands, and with a bounce let fall
Her baby, like the giant in Guildhall.

In peals of thunder now she roars, and now
She gently whimpers like a lowing cow;
Yet lovely in her sorrow still appears:
Her locks dishevell'd, and her flood of tears,
Seem like the lofty barn of some rich swain,
When from the thatch drips fast a show'r of rain.

In vain she search'd each cranny of the house,
Each gaping chink impervious to a mouse.
"Was it for this," she cried, "with daily care
Within thy reach I set the vinegar;
And fill'd the cruet with the acid tide,
While pepper-water worms thy bait supplied,
Where twin'd the silver eel around thy hook,
And all the little monsters of the brook?
Sure in that lake he dropp'd: my Grilly's drown'd."

She dragg'd the cruet, but no Grildrig found.

"Vain is thy courage, Grilly, vain thy boast:
But little creatures enterprise the most.
Trembling I've seen thee dare the kitten's paw,
Nay mix with children as they play'd at taw,
Nor fear'd the marbles as they bounding flew;
Marbles to them, but rolling rocks to you.

"Why did I trust thee with that giddy youth?
Who from a page can ever learn the truth?
Vers'd in court-tricks, that money-loving boy
To some lord's daughter sold the living toy;
Or rent him limb from limb, in cruel play,
As children tear the wings of flies away.
From place to place o'er Biobdignag I'll roam,
And never will return, or bring thee home.
But who hath eyes to trace the passing wind?
How then thy fairy footsteps can I find?
Dost thou, bewilder'd, wander all alone
In the green thicket of a mossy stone;
Or tumbled from the toadstool's slippery round,
Perhaps all maim'd, lie grovelling on the ground?
Dost thou embosom'd in the lovely rose,
Or sunk within the peach's down, repose?
Within the king-cup if thy limbs are spread,
Or in the golden cowslip's velvet head,
O show me, Flora, 'midst those sweets, the flow'r
Where sleeps my Grildrig in this fragrant bow'r!

"But, ah! I fear thy little fancy roves
On little females, and on little loves,
Thy pigmy children, and thy tiny spouse,
The baby playthings that adorn thy house,
Doors, windows, chimneys, and the spacious
Equal in size to cells of honey-combs. [rooms,

Hast thou for these now ventur'd from the shore,
Thy bark a bean-shell, and a straw thy oar?
Or in thy box, now bounding on the main,
Shall I ne'er bear thyself and house again?
And shall I set thee on my hand no more,
To see thee leap the lines, and traverse o'er
My spacious palm? of stature scarce a span,
Mimic the actions of a real man?
No more behold thee turn my watch's key,
As seamen at a capstern anchors weigh?
How wast thou wont to walk with cautious tread,
A dish of tea, like milk-pail, on thy head!
How chase the mite that bore thy cheese away,
And keep the rolling maggot at a bay!"
She said; but broken accents stopp'd her voice,
Soft as the speaking-trumpet's mellow noise.
She sobb'd a storm, and wip'd her flowing eyes,
Which seem'd like two broad suns in misty skies.
O squander not thy grief! those tears command
To weep upon our cod in Newfoundland:
The plenteous pickle shall preserve the fish,
And Europe taste thy sorrows in a dish.

Spring. An Ode. DR. JOHNSON.

STERN Winter now, by Spring repress'd,
Forbears the long-continued strife;
And Nature, on her naked breast,
Delights to catch the gales of life.

* Vulgo, salary. † Supposed sorrel. ‡ This is by Dr. Bentley thought to be time, or time.

¶ Which we suppose to be near four hours.

Now o'er the rural kingdom roves
 Soft pleasure with her laughing train;
 Love warbles in the vocal groves,
 And vegetation paints the plain.
 Unhappy whom to beds of pain
 Arthritic tyranny consigns *!
 Whom smiling nature courts in vain,
 Though rapture sings, and beauty shines!
 Yet though my limbs disease invades,
 Her wings Imagination tries,
 And bears me to the peaceful shades
 Where ——'s humble turrets rise.
 Here stop, my soul, thy rapid flight,
 Nor from the pleasing groves depart,
 Where first great nature charm'd my sight,
 Where wisdom first inform'd my heart.
 Here let me through the vales pursue
 A guide, a father, and a friend;
 Once more great nature's works review,
 Once more to wisdom's voice attend.
 From false caresses, causeless strife,
 Wild hope, vain fear, alike remov'd;
 Here let me learn the use of life,
 When best enjoy'd, when most improv'd.
 Teach me, thou venerable bow'r,
 Cool meditation's quiet seat,
 The generous scorn of venal pow'r,
 The silent grandeur of retreat.
 When pride by guilt to greatness climbs,
 Or raging factions rush to war,
 Here let me learn to shun the crimes
 I can't prevent, and will not share.
 But lest I fall by subtler foes,
 Bright wisdom, teach me Curio's art
 The swelling passions to compose,
 And quell the rebels of the heart.

The Midsummer's Wish. An Ode.
 DR. JOHNSON.

O PHŒBUS! down the western sky
 Far hence diffuse thy burning ray;
 Thy light to distant worlds supply,
 And wake them to the cares of day.
 Come, gentle eve, the friend of ease!
 Come, Cynthia, lovely queen of night!
 Refresh me with a cooling breeze,
 And cheer me with a lambent light.
 Lay me where o'er the verdant ground
 Her living carpet nature spreads;
 Where the green bow'r, with roses crown'd,
 In show'rs its fragrant foliage sheds.
 Improve the peaceful hour with wine,
 Let music die along the grove;
 Around the bowl let myrtles twine,
 And every strain be tun'd to love.
 Come, Stella, queen of all my heart!
 Come, born to fill its vast desires!

Thy looks perpetual joys impart,
 Thy voice perpetual love inspires.
 Whilst, all my wish and thine complete,
 By turns we languish and we burn,
 Let sighing gales our sighs repeat,
 Our murmurs, murmuring brooks return.
 Let me, when nature calls to rest,
 And blushing skies the morn foretel,
 Sink on the down of Stella's breast,
 And bid the waking world farewell.

Autumn. An Ode. DR. JOHNSON.

ALAS! with swift and silent pace
 Impatient time rolls on the year;
 The seasons change, and nature's face
 Now sweetly smiles, now frowns severe.
 'Twas Spring, 'twas Summer, all was gay,
 Now Autumn bends a cloudy brow;
 The flow'rs of Spring are swept away,
 And Summer fruits desert the bough.
 The verdant leaves that play'd on high,
 And wanton'd on the western breeze,
 Now trod in dust neglected lie,
 As Boreas strips the bending trees.
 The fields that wav'd with golden grain,
 As russet heaths are wild and bare,
 Not moist with dew, but drench'd in rain;
 Nor health nor pleasure wanders there.
 No more, while through the midnight shade
 Beneath the moon's pale orb I stray,
 Soft pleasing woes my heart invade,
 As Progne pours the melting lay.
 From this capricious clime she soars;
 O would some god but wings supply!
 To where each morn the Spring restores,
 Companion of her flight I'd fly.
 Vain wish! me fate compels to bear
 The downward season's iron reign,
 Compels to breathe polluted air,
 And shiver on a blasted plain.
 What bliss to life can Autumn yield,
 If glooms, and show'rs, and storms prevail;
 And Ceres flies the naked field,
 And flow'rs, and fruits, and Phœbus fail?
 O! what remains, what lingers yet,
 To cheer me in the darkening hour?
 The grape remains, the friend of wit,
 In love and mirth of mighty pow'r.
 Haste, press the clusters, fill the bowl;
 Apollo, shoot thy parting ray:
 This gives the sunshine of the soul,
 This god of health, and verse, and day.
 Still, still the jocund strain shall flow,
 The pulse with vigorous rapture beat;
 My Stella with new charms shall glow,
 And every bliss in wine shall meet.

* The author being ill of the gout.

Winter. An Ode. DR. JOHNSON.

No more the morn, with tepid rays,
 Unfolds the flow'r of various hue;
 Noon spreads no more the genial blaze,
 Nor gentle eve distils the dew.

The lingering hours prolong the night,
 Usurping darkness shares the day,
 Her mists restrain the force of light,
 And Phœbus holds a doubtful sway.

By gloomy twilight half reveal'd,
 With sighs we view the hoary hill,
 The leafless wood, the naked field,
 The snow-topt cot, the frozen rill.

No music warbles through the grove,
 No vivid colors paint the plain;
 No more with devious steps I rove
 Through verdant paths now sought in vain.

Aloud the driving tempest roars,
 Congeal'd, impetuous show'rs descend;
 Haste, close the window, bar the doors,
 Fate leaves me Stella, and a friend.

In nature's aid let art supply
 With light and heat my little sphere;
 Rouse, rouse the fire, and pile it high:
 Light up a constellation here.

Let music sound the voice of joy,
 Or mirth repeat the jocund tale;
 Let Love his wanton wiles employ,
 And o'er the season wine prevail.

Yet time life's dreary winter brings,
 When mirth's gay tale shall please no more;
 Nor music charm, though Stella sings;
 Nor love, nor wine, the spring restore.

Catch then, O catch, the transient hour;
 Improve each moment as it flies.
 Life's a short Summer, man a flow'r;
 He dies—alas! how soon he dies!

An Evening Ode. To Stella. DR. JOHNSON.

EVENING now from purple wings
 Sheds the grateful gifts she brings;
 Brilliant drops bedeck the mead;
 Cooling breezes shake the reed,
 Shake the reed, and curl the stream
 Silver'd o'er with Cynthia's beam;
 Near the chequer'd lonely grove,
 Hears and keeps thy secrets Love.

Stella, thither let us stray
 Lightly o'er the dewy way.
 Phœbus drives his burning car
 Hence, my lovely Stella, far;
 In his stead, the queen of night
 Round us pours a lambent light;
 Light that seems but just to show
 Breasts that beat, and cheeks that glow.

Let us now, in whisper'd joy,
 Evening's silent hours employ;
 Silence best, and conscious shades,
 Please the hearts that love invades;
 Other pleasures give them pain,
 Lovers all but love disdain.

The Natural Beauty. To Stella. DR. JOHNSON.

WHETHER Stella's eyes are found
 Fix'd on earth or glancing round,
 If her face with pleasure glow,
 If she sigh at others' woe,
 If her easy air express
 Conscious worth or soft distress,
 Stella's eyes, and air, and face.
 Charm with undiminish'd grace.

If on her we see display'd
 Pendant gems, and rich brocade;
 If her chintz with less expense
 Flows in easy negligence;
 Still she lights the conscious flame,
 Still her charms appear the same:
 If she strikes the vocal strings,
 If she's silent, speaks, or sings,
 If she sit, or if she move,
 Still we love, and still approve.

Vain the casual, transient glance,
 Which alone can please by chance,
 Beauty which depends on art,
 Changing with the changing heart,
 Which demands the toilet's aid,
 Pendant gems and rich brocade.
 I those charms alone can prize
 Which from constant nature rise,
 Which nor circumstance nor dress
 E'er can make or more or less.

The Vanity of Wealth. DR. JOHNSON.

No more thus brooding o'er you heap,
 With Avarice painful vigils keep;
 Still unenjoy'd the present store,
 Still endless sighs are breath'd for more.
 O quit the shadow, catch the prize
 Which not all India's treasure buys!
 To purchase heaven has gold the pow'r?
 Can gold remove the mortal hour?
 In life can love be bought with gold?
 Are friendship's pleasures to be sold?
 No—all that's worth a wish, a thought,
 Fair virtue gives unbrib'd, unbought.
 Cease then on trash thy hopes to bind,
 Let nobler views engage thy mind.
 With science tread the wondrous way,
 Or learn the Muse's moral lay;
 In social hours indulge thy soul,
 Where mirth and temperance mix the bowl;
 To virtuous love resign thy breast,
 And be, by blessing beauty, blest.

Thus taste the feast by nature spread,
 Ere youth and all its joys are fled;
 Come taste with me the balm of life,
 Secure from pomp, and wealth, and strife.
 I boast whate'er for man was meant,
 In health, and Stella, and content;
 And scorn (O let that scorn be thine!)
 Mere things of clay that dig the mine.

To Miss ———, on her giving the Author a Gold and Silk Net-work Purse of her own weaving.

DR. JOHNSON.

THOUGH gold and silk their charms unite,
 To make thy curious web delight,

In vain the varied work would shine,
If wrought by any hand, but thine;
Thy hand, that knows the subtler art
To weave those nets that catch the heart.

Spread out by me, the roving coin
Thy nets may catch, but not confine;
Nor can I hope the silken chain
The glittering vagrants shall restrain.
Why, Stella, was it then decreed,
The heart once caught should ne'er be freed?

To LYCE, an elderly Lady. DR. JOHNSON.

YE nymphs whom starry rays invest,
By flattering poets given,
Who shine by lavish lovers drest
In all the pomp of heaven!

Engross not all the beams on high
Which gild a lover's lays;
But, as your sister of the sky,
Let Lyce share the praise.

Her silver locks display the moon,
Her brows a cloud do show:
Strip'd rainbows round her eyes are seen,
And show'rs from either flow.

Her teeth the night with darkness dyes,
She's starr'd with pimples o'er;
Her tongue like nimble lightning plies,
And can with thunder roar.

But some Zelinda, while I sing,
Denies my Lyce shines:
And all the pens of Cupid's wing
Attack my gentle lines.

Yet spite of fair Zelinda's eye,
And all her bards express,
My Lyce makes as good a sky,
And I but flatter less.

Epitaph on Sir Thomas Hanmer.

DR. JOHNSON.

THOU who survey'st these walls with curious
eye,
Pause at this tomb where HANMER'S ashes lie:
His various worth through varied life attend,
And learn his virtues while thou mourn'st his end.

His force of genius burn'd in early youth
With thirst of knowledge and with love of truth;

His learning, join'd with each endearing art,
Charm'd every ear, and gain'd on every heart.

Thus early wise, th' endanger'd realm to aid,
His country call'd him from the studious shade:
In life's first bloom his public toils began,
At once commenc'd the senator and man.

In business dext'rous, weighty in debate,
Thrice ten long years he labor'd for the state.
In every speech persuasive wisdom flow'd,
In every act refulgent virtue glow'd;
Suspended faction ceas'd from rage and strife,
To hear his eloquence, and praise his life.

Resistless merit fix'd the Senate's choice,
Who hail'd him Speaker with united voice.

Illustrious age! how bright thy glories shone,
When HANMER fill'd the chair, and ANNE the throne!

Then when dark arts obscur'd each fierce
debate,

When mutual frauds perplex'd the maze of state,
The Moderator firmly mild appear'd,
Beheld with love, with veneration heard.

This task perform'd, he sought no gainful
post,

Nor wish'd to glitter at his country's cost:
Strict on the right he fix'd his steadfast eye,
With temperate zeal, and wise anxiety;
Nor e'er from Virtue's paths was lar'd aside,
To pluck the flow'rs of pleasure or of pride.
Her gifts despis'd, Corruption blush'd and fled,
And Fame pursu'd him where Conviction led.

Age call'd at length his active mind to rest,
With honors sated, and with cares oppress:
To letter'd ease retir'd, and honest mirth,
To rural grandeur, and domestic worth,
Delighted still to please mankind, or mend,
The patriot's fire yet sparkled in the friend.

Calm Conscience then his former life survey'd,

And recollected toils endear'd the shade;
Till Nature call'd him to the general doom,
And Virtue's sorrow dignified his tomb.

SONNETS BY WARTON.

Written at Wynslade, in Hampshire.

WYNSLADE, thy beech-capt hills, with waving grain

Mantled, thy chequer'd views of wood and lawn,

Whilom could charm, or when the gradual dawn

'Gan the grey mist with orient purple stain,

Or evening glimmer'd o'er the folded train:

Her fairest landscapes whence my Muse has drawn,

Too free with servile courtly phrase to fawn,
Too weak to try the buskin's stately strain.

Yet now no more thy slopes of beech and corn,
Nor views invite, since he far distant strays

With whom I trac'd their sweets at eve and morn,

From Albion far, to cull Hesperian bays;

In this alone they please, howe'er forlorn,

That still they can recall those happier days.

On Bathing.

WHEN late the trees were stript by winter pale,
Young Health, a dryad-maid in vesture green,

Or like the forest's silver-quiver'd queen,

On early uplands met the piercing gale;

And, ere its earliest echo shook the vale,

Watching the hunter's joyous horn was seen.

But since, gay-thron'd in fiery chariot sheen,
Summer has smote each daisy-dappled dale;

She to the cave retires high-arch'd, beneath

The fount that laves proud Isis' tow' red brim

And now all glad the temperate air to breathe,
While cooling drops distil from arches dim,
Binding her dewy locks with sedgy wreath,
She sits amid the quire of Naiads trim.

Written in a Blank Leaf of Dugdale's Monasticon.

DEEM not devoid of elegance the sage,
By Fancy's genuine feelings unbeguil'd,
Of painful Pedantry the poring child,
Who turns of those proud domes th' historic page,
Now sunk by Time and Henry's fiercer rage.
Think'st thou the warbling Muses ever smil'd
On his lone hours? Ingenious views engage
His thought, on themes, unclassic falsely styl'd,
Intent. While cloister'd Piety displays
Her mouldering roll, the piercing eye explores
New manners, and the pomp of elder days,
Whence culls the pensive bard his pictur'd stores.
Nor rough nor barren are the winding ways
Of hoar Antiquity, but strewn with flow'rs.

Written at Stonehenge.

THOU noblest monument of Albion's isle!

To Amber's fatal plain Pendragon bore,
Huge frame of giant hands, the mighty pile,
T'entomb his Britons slain by Hengist's guile*:
Or Druid priests, sprinkled with human gore,
Taught 'mid thy massy maze their mystic lore:
Or Danish chiefs, enrich'd with savage spoil,
To Victory's idol vast, an unhewn shrine,
Rear'd the rude heap; or, in thy hallow'd round,
Repose the kings of Brutus' genuine line:
Or here those kings in solemn state were crown'd:
Studious to trace thy wondrous origin,
We muse on many an ancient tale renown'd.

Written after seeing Wilton-House.

FROM Pembroke's princely dome, where mimic Art
Decks with a magic hand the dazzling bow'rs,
Its living hues where the warm pencil pours,
And breathing forms from the rude marble start,
How to life's humbler scene can I depart?
My breast all glowing from those gorgeous tow'rs,
In my low cell how cheat the sullen hours?
Vain the complaint: for Fancy can impart
(To Fate superior, and to Fortune's doom)
Whate'er adorns the stately storied hall:
She, 'mid the dungeon's solitary gloom,
Can dress the Graces in their Attic pall;
Bid the green landscape's vernal beauty gloom;
And in bright trophies clothe the twilight wall.

* One of the bardish traditions about Stonehenge.

To Mr. Gray.

Nor that her blooms are mark'd with beauty hue,
My rustic Muse her votive chaplet brings;
Unseen, unheard, O Gray, to thee she sings
While slowly pacing through the church-yard dew,
At curfew-time, beneath the dark green yew
Thy pensive Genius strikes the moral string,
Or, borne sublime on Inspiration's wings,
Hears Cambria's bards devote the dreadful clime
Of Edward's race, with murders foul defil'd.
Can aught my pipe to reach thine ear essay
No, bard divine! For many a care beguil'd
By the sweet magic of thy soothing lay,
For many a raptur'd thought, and vision wild
To thee this strain of gratitude I pay.

Sonnet.

WHILE summer-suns o'er the gay prospect
play'd,
Through Surrey's verdant scenes, where Epsom spreads,
'Mid intermingling elms, her flow'ry meads
And Hascombe's hill, in tow'ring groves array'd,
Rear'd its romantic steep—with mind serene
I journey'd blithe. Full pensive I return'd
For now my breast with hopeless passion
burn'd.
Wet with hoar mists appear'd the gaudy scene
Which late in careless indolence I pass'd,
And Autumn all around those hues had cast
Where past delight my recent grief might trace.
Sad change! that Nature a congenial gloom Should wear, when most, my cheerless mood to chase,
I wish'd her green attire, and wonted bloom!

On King Arthur's Round Table at Winchester.

WHERE Venta's Norman castle still uprears
Its rafter'd hall, that o'er the grassy loss
And scatter'd flinty fragments, clad in moss,
On yonder steep in naked state appears:
High-hung remains, the pride of warlike years,
Old Arthur's Board: on the capacious round
Some British pen has sketch'd the names re-nown'd,
In marks obscure, of his immortal peers.
Tho' join'd by magic skill, with many a rhyme,
The Druid frame unhonor'd falls a prey
To the slow vengeance of the wizard Time,
And fade the British characters away;
Yet Spenser's page, that chants in verse sublime
Those chiefs, shall live unconscious of decay.

To the River Lodon.

AH! what a weary race my feet have run,
Since first I trod thy banks with alders crown'd,
And thought my way was all through fairy
ground,
Beneath the azure sky, and golden sun,

Where first my muse to lisp her notes begun !
 While pensive memory traces back the round
 Which fills the varied interval between,
 Much pleasure, more of sorrow, marks the scene.
 Sweet native stream ! those skies and sun so pure
 No more return to cheer my evening road !
 Yet still one joy remains, that not obscure
 Nor useless all my vacant days have flow'd,
 From youth's gay dawn to manhood's prime mature ;
 Nor with the Muse's laurel unbestow'd.

The Pilgrim and the Peas. A true Story.
 PETER PINDAR.

A BRACE of sinners, for no good,
 Were order'd to the Virgin Mary's shrine,
 Who at Loretto dwelt, in wax, stone, wood,
 And in a fair white wig look'd wondrous fine.

Fifty long miles had those sad rogues to travel,
 With something in their shoes much worse than gravel ;

In short, their toes so gentle to amuse,
 The priest had order'd peas into their shoes :
 A nostrum famous in old Popish times
 For purifying souls that stunk with crimes ;
 A sort of apostolic salt,
 That Popish parsons for its powers exalt
 For keeping souls of sinners sweet,
 Just as our kitchen salt keeps meat.

The knaves set off on the same day,
 Peas in their shoes, to go and pray ;
 But very different was their speed, I wot :
 One of the sinners gallop'd on
 Light as a bullet from a gun ;
 The other limp'd as if he had been shot.

One saw the VIRGIN soon—peccavi cried—
 Had his soul whitewash'd all so clever ;
 Then home again he nimbly hied,
 Made fit with saints above to live for ever.

In coming back, however, let me say,
 He met his brother-rogue about half-way,
 Hobbling with outstretch'd bum and bending
     knees,
 Damning the souls and bodies of the peas :
 His eyes in tears, his cheeks and brows in sweat,
 Deep sympathizing with his groaning feet.

"How now," the light-toed, whitewash'd pilgrim broke,

"You lazy lubber?"

"Odds curse it!" cried the other, "'tis no
 My feet, once hard as any rock, [joke:
     "Are now as soft as blubber."

"Excuse me, Virgin Mary, that I swear—
 As for Loretto, I shall not get there :
 No ! to the Devil my sinful soul must go,
 For damme if I han't lost ev'ry toe.
 But, brother sinner, do explain
 How 'tis that you are not in pain ;

"What Pow'r hath work'd a wonder for your toes ;

Whilst I just like a snail am crawling,
 Now swearing, now on saints devoutly bawling,
 Whilst not a rascal comes to ease my woes ?
 How is't that you can like a greyhound go,
 Merry as if that nought had happen'd, burn
     ye?"—

"Why," cried the other, grinning, "you must know,
 That, just before I ventur'd on my journey,
 To walk a little more at ease,
 I took the liberty to boil my peas."

A Country Bumpkin and Razor-seller.
 PETER PINDAR.

A FELLOW in a market town,
 Most musical, cried razors up and down,
 And offer'd twelve for eighteen pence ;
 Which certainly seem'd wondrous cheap,
 And for the money quite a heap,
 As every man would buy with cash and sense.

A country bumpkin the great offer heard,— Poor Hodge, who suffer'd by a broad black beard,
 That seem'd a shoe-brush stuck beneath his
     nose :

With cheerfulness the eighteen pence he paid ;
 And proudly to himself in whispers said,
 "This rascal stole the razors, I suppose."

"No matter, if the fellow be a knave :
 Provided that the razors shave,
 It certainly will be a monstrous prize."
 So home the clown with his good fortune went,
 Smiling, in heart and soul content,
 And quickly soap'd himself to ears and eyes.

Being well lather'd from a dish or tub,
 Hodge now began with grinning pain to grub,
 Just like a hedger cutting furze ;
 'Twas a vile razor ! then the rest he tried—
 All were impostors—"Ah !" Hodge sigh'd,
 "I wish my eighteen pence within my purse."

In vain to chase his beard, and bring the graces,
 He cut, and dug, and winc'd, and stamp'd,
     and swore ;
 Brought blood, and danc'd, blasphem'd, and
     made wry faces,
 And curs'd each razor's body o'er and o'er.

His MUZZLE, form'd of opposition stuff,
 Firm as a Foxite, would not lose its ruff :
 So kept it—laughing at the steel and suds.
 Hodge, in a passion, stretch'd his angry jaws,
 Vowing the direst vengeance, with clench'd claws,

On the vile CHEAT that sold the goods.
 "Razors !—a damn'd, confounded dog !—
 Not fit to scrape a hog ;"

Hodge sought the fellow, found him, and begun—
 "Perhaps, Master Razor-Rogue, to you 'tis fun,

That people flay themselves out of their lives:
You rascal! for an hour I have been grubbing,
Giving myscoundrel whiskers here a scrubbing,
With razors just like oyster knives.
Sirrah! I tell you you're a knave,
To cry up razors that can't shave."

"Friend," quoth the razor-man, "I'm not a knave:

As for the razors you have bought,
Upon my soul I never thought
That they would shave."

"Not think they'd shave!" quoth Hodge, with wond'ring eyes,

And voice not much unlike an Indian yell;
"What were they made for then, you dog?" he cries:

"Made!" quoth the fellow with a smile—
"to sell."

The Bald-pated Welshman and the Fly.

SOMERVILLE.

—"Qui non moderabitur iræ,
Infectum volet esse, dolor quod suaserit et mens,
Dum pœnasodio pervim festinat inulto." HOR.

A SQUIRE of Wales, whose blood ran higher
Than that of any other squire,
Hasty and hot; whose peevish honor
Reveng'd each slight was put upon her;
Upon a mountain's top one day
Expos'd to Sol's meridian ray,
He fum'd, he rav'd, he curs'd, he swore,
Exhal'd a sea at ev'ry pore;
At last, such insults to evade,
Sought the next tree's protecting shade;
Where as he lay dissolv'd in sweat,
And wip'd off many a rivulet,
Off in a pet the beaver flies,
And flaxen wig, time's best disguise,
By which folks of maturer ages
Vie with smooth beaux, and ladies' pages;
Though 'twas a secret rarely known,
Ill-natur'd age had cropp'd his crown,
Grubb'd all the covert up, and now
A large smooth plain extends his brow.
Thus as he lay with numskull bare,
And courted the refreshing air,
New persecutions still appear;
A noisy fly offends his ear.
Alas! what man of parts and sense
Could bear such vile impertinence?
Yet, so discourteous is our fate,
Fools always buz about the great.
This insect now, whose active spite
Teas'd him with never-ceasing bite,
With so much judgment play'd his part,
He had him both in tierce and carte:
In vain with open hands he tries
To guard his ears, his nose, his eyes;
For now at last, familiar grown,
He perch'd upon his worship's crown,
With teeth and claws his skin he tore,
And stuff'd himself with human gore:
At last, in manners to excel,
Untruss'd a point, some authors tell.

But now what rhetoric could assuage
The furious squire, stark mad with rage?
Impatient at the foul disgrace
From insect of so mean a race,
And plotting vengeance on his foe,
With double fist he aims a blow.
The nimble fly escaped by flight,
And skipp'd from this unequal fight.
Th' impending stroke with all its weight
Fell on his own beloved pate.
Thus much he gain'd by this adventurous deed;
He foul'd his fingers, and he broke his head.

MORAL.

Let senates hence learn to preserve their state,
And scorn the fool, below their grave debate,
Who by the unequal strife grows popular and great.

Let him buz on, with senseless rant defy
The wise, the good, yet still 'tis but a fly.
With puny foes the toil's not worth the cost;
Where nothing can be gain'd, much may be lost:

Let cranes and pigmies in mock-war engage,
A prey beneath the gen'rous eagle's rage,
True honor o'er the clouds sublimely wings;
Young Ammon scorns to run with less than kings.

The Incurious Bench. SOMERVILLE.

AT Jenny Mann's, where heroes meet,
And lay their laurels at her feet;
The modern Pallas, at whose shrine
They bow, and by whose aid they dine;
Colonel Brocade, among the rest,
Was every day a welcome guest.
One night as carelessly he stood,
Cheering his reins before the fire
(So every true-born Briton should)
Like that he chaf'd and fum'd with ire.
"Jenny," said he, "'tis very hard,
That no man's honor can be spar'd;
If I but sup with Lady Duchess,
Or play a game at ombre, such is
The malice of the world, 'tis said,
Although his Grace lay drunk in bed,
'Twas I that caus'd his aching head.
If Madame Doodle would be witty,
And I am summon'd to the city,
To play at blindman's-buff or so,
What won't such hellish malice do?
If I but catch her in a corner,
Humph! 'tis "Your servant, Colonel Horner."
But rot the sneering fops, if e'er
I prove it, it shall cost them dear;
I swear by this dead-doing blade,
Dreadful examples shall be made.
What, can't they drink bohea and cream,
But (d—n them) I must be their theme?
Other men's business let alone,
Why should not coxcombs mind their own?
As thus he rav'd with all his might (How insecure from fortune's spite, Alas, is ev'ry mortal wight!)

To show his ancient spleen to Mars,
Fierce Vulcan caught him by the a—;
Stuck to his skirts, insatiate varlet!
And fed with pleasure on the scarlet.
Hard by, and in the corner, sate
A bencher grave, with looks sedate,
Smoking his pipe, warm as a toast,
And reading over last week's Post;
He saw the foe the fort invade,
And soon smelt out the breach he made;
But not a word—a little sly
He look'd, 'tis true, and from each eye
A sidelong glance sometimes he sent,
To bring him news, and watch th' event.
At length, upon that tender part
Where honor lodges (as of old Authentic Hudibras has told)
The blust'ring colonel felt a smart;
Sore griev'd for his affronted bum,
Frisk'd, skipp'd, and bounc'd about the room:
Then turning short—"Zounds, sir," he cries;
"Pox on him! had the fool no eyes?
What! let a man be burnt alive?"

"I am not, Sir, inquisitive," Replied Sir Gravity, "to know
Whate'er your Honor's pleas'd to do:
If you will burn your tail to tinder,
Pray what have I to do to hinder?
Other men's business let alone,
Why should not coxcombs mind their own?"

Then, knocking out his pipe with care,
Laid down his penny at the bar;
And wrapping round his frieze surtout,
Took up his crabtree and walk'd out.

The Frog's Choice. SOMERVILLE.

Ὁ πόποι, οἷον δὴ νῦν θεοὶ βροτοὶ ἀπιόντωνται.
Εἰς ἡμεῶν γὰρ φασὶ καὶ ἔμμεναι οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ
Εὐφῆσιν ἀτασθαλίῃσιν ὑπὲρ μέτρον ἀλγὶ "χρυσίν.

IN a wild state of nature, long
The frogs at random liv'd,
The weak a prey unto the strong,
With anarchy oppress'd and griev'd.
At length the lawless rout,
Taught by their suff'rings, grew devout;
An embassy to Jove they sent,
And begg'd his highness would bestow
Some settled form of government,
A king to rule the fens below.
Jove, smiling, grants their odd request:
A king, th' indulgent pow'r bestow'd,
Such as might suit their genius best:
A beam of a prodigious size,
With all its cumbrous load,
Came tumbling from the skies.
The waters dash against the shore,
The hollow caverns roar:
The rocks return the dreadful sound,
Convulsions shake the ground.
The multitude with horror fled,
And in his oozy bed
Each skulking coward hid his head.

When all is now grown calm again,
And smoothly glides the liquid plain,
A frog more resolute and bold,
Peeping with caution from his hold,

Recover'd from his first surprise,
As o'er the wave his head he popp'd,
He saw, but scarce believ'd his eyes.
On the same bank where first he dropp'd,
Th' imperial lubber lies,
Stretch'd at his ease, careless, content.
"Is this the monarch Jove has sent,"
Said he, "our warlike troops to lead?
Ah, 'tis a glorious prince indeed!
By such an active general led,
The routed mice our arms shall dread,
Subdued shall quit their claim:
Old Homer shall recant his lays,
For us new trophies raise,
Sing our victorious arms, and justify our fame!"
Then laughing impudently loud,
He soon alarm'd the dastard crowd.
The croaking nations with contempt
Behold the worthless indolent.
On wings of winds swift scandal flies,
Libels, lampoons, and lies,
Hoarse treasons, tuneless blasphemies.
With active leap at last upon his back they stride,
And on the royal loggerhead in triumph ride.

Once more to Jove they prayers address'd,
And once more Jove grants their request:
A stork he sends, of monstrous size,
Red lightning flashes in his eyes.
Rul'd by no block, as heretofore,
The gazing crowds press'd to his court;
Admire his stately mien, his haughty port,
And only not adore.
Addresses of congratulation,
Sent from each loyal corporation,
Full fraught with truth and sense,
Exhausted all their eloquence.
But now, alas! 'twas night; kings must have meat:

The Grand Vizier first goes to pot;
Three Bassas next, happy their lot!
Gain'd Paradise by being eat.
"And this," said he, "and this is mine,
And this by right divine:"
In short, 'twas all for public weal,
He swallow'd half a nation at a meal.

Again they beg Almighty Jove
This cruel tyrant to remove.
With fierce resentment in his eyes,
The frowning Thunderer replies:
"Those evils which yourselves create,
Rash fools! ye now repent too late;
Made wretched by the public voice,
Not through necessity, but choice!
Begone! nor wrest from Heaven some heavier
curse:
Better bear this, this Stork, than worse."

MORAL.

Oppress'd with happiness, and sick with ease,
Not Heaven itself our fickle minds can please.
Fondly we wish, cloy'd with celestial store,
The leeks and onions which we loath'd before:
Still roving, still desiring, never pleas'd,
With plenty starv'd, and e'en with health diseas'd,

With partial eyes each present good we view,
Nor covet what is best, but what is new.
Ye pow'rs above, who make mankind your care,
To bless the suppliant, reject his pray'r!

The Oyster. SOMERVILLE.

—In jus
Acres procurrunt, magnum spectaculum uterque. HOR.

Two comrades, as grave authors say
(But in what chapter, page, or line, Ye critics, if ye please, define),
Had found an oyster in their way.
Contest and soul debate arose:
Both view'd at once with greedy eyes,
Both challeng'd the delicious prize,
And high words soon improv'd to blows.
Actions on actions hence succeed,
Each hero's obstinately stout,
Green bags and parchments fly about,
Pleadings are drawn, and counsel fee'd.
The parson of the place, good man!
Whose kind and charitable heart
In human ills still bore a part,
Thrice shook his head, and thus began:
"Neighbours and friends, refer to me
This doughty matter in dispute,
I'll soon decide th' important suit,
And finish all without a fee.
Give me the oyster then—'tis well"—
He opens it, and at one sup
Gulps the contested trifle up,
And smiling, gives to each a shell.
"Henceforth let foolish discord cease,
Your oyster's good as e'er was eat;
I thank you for my dainty treat;
God bless you both, and live in peace."

MORAL.

Ye men of Norfolk and of Wales,
From this learn common sense;
Nor thrust your neighbours into jails
For ev'ry slight offence.
Banish those vermin of debate
That on your substance feed;
The knaves who now are serv'd in plate
Would starve, if fools agreed.

Epitaph on Miss Basnet, in St. Pancras Church-yard,

Go, spotless Honor, and unsullied Truth;
Go, smiling Innocence and blooming Youth;
Go, female Sweetness, join'd with manly Sense;
Go, winning Wit, that never gave offence;
Go, soft Humanity, that bless'd the poor;
Go, saint-eyed Patience, from Affliction's door;
Go, Modesty, that never wore a frown;
Go, Virtue, and receive thy heavenly crown.
Not from a stranger came this heart-felt verse;
The friend inscribes thy tomb whose tears be-dew'd thy hearse.

Ode. THOMSON.

TELL me, thou soul of her I love,
Ah! tell me whither art thou fled?
To what delightful world above,
Appointed for the happy dead?
Or dost thou free at pleasure roam,
And sometimes share the lover's woe;
Where, void of thee, his cheerless home
Can now, alas! no comfort know?
O! if thou hov'rest round my walk,
While, under every well-known tree,
I to thy fancied shadow talk,
And every tear is full of thee:
Should then the weary eye of grief,
Beside some sympathetic stream,
In slumber find a short relief,
O visit thou my soothing dream!

On Time. ANON.

E'EN while the careless, disencumber'd soul
Sinks all dissolving into pleasure's dream,
E'en then to Time's tremendous verge we roll
With headlong haste along life's surgystream.
Can gaiety the vanish'd years restore,
Or on the withering limbs fresh beauty shed,
Or soothe the sad, inevitable hour,
Or cheer the dark, dark mansions of the dead?
Ah! beauty's bloom avails not in the grave,
Youth's lofty mien, nor age's awful grace;
Moulder alike unknown the prince and slave,
Whelm'd in th' enormous wreck of human race!
The thought-fix'd portraiture, the breathing
bust,
The arch with proud memorials array'd,
The long-liv'd pyramid, shall sink in dust,
To dumb oblivion's ever-desert shade.

My Mother.

Who fed me from her gentle breast,
And hush'd me in her arms to rest,
And on my cheek sweet kisses prest?
My Mother.
When sleep forsook my open eye,
Who was it sung sweet lullaby,
And rock'd me that I should not cry?
My Mother.
Who sat and watch'd my infant head,
When sleeping on my cradle bed,
And tears of sweet affliction shed?
My Mother.
When pain and sickness made me cry,
Who gaz'd upon my heavy eye,
And wept for fear that I should die?
My Mother.
Who drest my doll in clothes so gay,
And taught me pretty how to play,
And minded all I had to say?
My Mother.

Who ran to help me when I fell,
And would some pretty story tell,
Or kiss the place to make it well?

My Mother.

Who taught my infant lips to pray,
To love God's holy Word and day,
And walk in Wisdom's pleasant way?

My Mother.

And can I ever cease to be
Affectionate and kind to thee,
Who wast so very kind to me,

My Mother?

Oh no! The thought I cannot bear,
And, if God please my life to spare,
I hope I shall reward thy care,

My Mother.

When thou art feeble, old, and grey,
My healthy arm shall be thy stay,
And I will soothe thy pains away,

My Mother.

And when I see thee hang thy head,
'Twill be my turn to watch thy bed,
And tears of sweet affection shed,

My Mother.

For God, who lives above the skies,
Would look with vengeance in his eyes,
If I should ever dare despise

My Mother.

The Butterfly's Ball. ROSCOE.

COME take up your hats, and away let us haste
To the Butterfly's ball, and the Grasshopper's feast.

[crew,

The trumpeter, Gad-fly, has summon'd the
And the revels are now only waiting for you.

So said little Robert, and pacing along,
His merry companions came forth in a throng.
And on the smooth grass, by the side of a
wood,

Beneath a broad oak that for ages had stood,
Saw the children of earth, and the tenants
of air,

For an evening's amusement together repair.
And there came the Beetle, so blind and so black,

[back.

Who carried the Emmet, his friend, on his
And there was the Gnat and the Dragon-fly too,

[blue.

With all their relations, green, orange, and
And there came the Moth, with his plumage of down,

[brown;

And the Hornet in jacket of yellow and

Who with him the Wasp, his companion, did bring,

[sting.

But they promis'd that evening to lay by their
And the sly little Dormouse crept out of his hole,

[Mole.

And brought to the feast his blind brother, the

And the Snail, with his horns peeping out of his shell,

[an ell.

Came from a great distance, the length of
A mushroom their table, and on it was laid
A water-dock leaf, which a table-cloth made.

The viands were various, to each of their taste,
And the Bee brought her honey to crown the repast.

Then close on his haunches, so solemn and wise,

[skies.

The Frog from a corner look'd up to the

And the Squirrel, well pleas'd such diversions to see,

[from a tree.

Mounted high over head, and look'd down
Then out came the Spider, with finger so fine,
To shew his dexterity on the tight line.

From one branch to another, his cobwebs he slung,

Then quick as an arrow he darted along.

But just in the middle,—Oh! shocking to tell,

[fell.

From his rope, in an instant, poor harlequin

Yet he touch'd not the ground, but with talon<sup>s</sup>
outspread,

Hung suspended in air, at the end of a thread.
Then the Grasshopper came with a jerk and a spring,

[his wing;

Very long was his leg, though but short was
He took but three leaps, and was soon out of sight,

the night.

Then chirp'd his own praises the rest of
With step so majestic the Snail did advance,
And promis'd the gazers a minuet to dance.

But they all laugh'd so loud that he pull'd in his head,

And went in his own little chamber to bed.
Then, as evening gave way to the shadows of
night,

with a light.

Their watchman, the Glow-worm, came out

Then home let us hasten, while yet we can see,

[me.

For no Watchman is waiting for you and for
So said little Robert, and pacing along,

His merry companions return'd in a throng.

SONGS, BALLADS, &c. &c.

§ 1. Song. LORD LYTTLTON.

SAY, Mira, why is gentle Love
A stranger to that mind,
Which pity and esteem can move,
Which can be just and kind?

Is it because you fear to share
The ills that love molest,
The jealous doubt, the tender care,
That rack the am'rous breast?

Alas! by some degree of woe
 We ev'ry bliss must gain:
 The heart can ne'er a transport know,
 That never feels a pain.

§ 2. Song. WALLER.

Go, lovely rose!
 Tell her that wastes her time, and me,
 That now she knows,
 When I resemble her to thee,
 How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her that's young,
 And shuns to have her graces spied,
 That hadst thou sprung
 In deserts, where no men abide,
 Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
 Of beauty, from the light retir'd;
 Bid her come forth,
 Suffer herself to be desir'd,
 And not blush so to be admir'd.

Then die! that she
 The common fate of all things rare
 May read in thee:
 How small a part of time they share,
 That are so wondrous sweet and fair.

§ 3. Song. L'Amour Timide. MOORE.

If in that breast, so good, so pure,
 Compassion ever lov'd to dwell,
 Pity the sorrows I endure,
 The cause I must not, dare not tell.

That grief that on my quiet preys,
 That rends my heart, that checks my tongue,
 I fear will last me all my days,
 But feel it will not last me long.

§ 4. Song. EARL of DORSET*.

To all you ladies now at land
 We men at sea indite;
 But first would have you understand
 How hard it is to write;
 The Muses now, and Neptune too,
 We must implore, to write to you,
 With a fa la, la, la, la.

For though the Muses should prove kind,
 And fill our empty brain;
 Yet if rough Neptune rouse the wind
 To wave the azure main,

Our paper, pen, and ink, and we,
 Roll up and down our ships at sea,
 With a fa, &c.

Then, if we write not by each post,
 Think not we are unkind;
 Nor yet conclude our ships are lost
 By Dutchmen or by wind;
 Our tears we'll send a speedier way,
 The tide shall bring them twice a day,
 With a fa, &c.

The king, with wonder and surprise,
 Will swear the seas grow bold;
 Because the tide will higher rise,
 Then e'er it did of old:
 But let him know it is our tears
 Bring floods of tears to Whitehall stairs,
 With a fa, &c.

Should foggy Opdam chance to know
 Our sad and dismal story;
 The Dutch would scorn so weak a foe,
 And quit their fort at Goree:
 For what resistance can they find
 From men who've left their hearts behind?
 With a fa, &c.

Let wind and weather do its worst;
 Be you to us but kind,
 Let Dutchmen vapour, Spaniards curse,
 No sorrow we shall find:
 'Tis then no matter how things go,
 Or who's our friend, or who's our foe,
 With a fa, &c.

To pass our tedious hours away,
 We throw a merry main;
 Or else at serious ombre play;
 But why should we in vain
 Each other's ruin thus pursue?
 We were undone when we left you,
 With a fa, &c.

But now our fears tempestuous grow,
 And cast our hopes away;
 Whilst you, regardless of our woe,
 Sit careless at a play:
 Perhaps permit some happier man
 To kiss your hand, or flirt your fan,
 With a fa, &c.

When any mournful tune you hear,
 That dies in ev'ry note;
 As if it sigh'd with each man's care
 For being so remote:
 Think then how often love we've made
 To you, when all those tunes were play'd,
 With a fa, &c.

In justice you cannot refuse
 To think of our distress,
 When we for hopes of honor lose
 Our certain happiness;
 All those designs are but to prove
 Ourselves more worthy of your love,
 With a fa, &c.

* Written at sea, the first Dutch war, 1665, the night before an engagement.

And now we've told you all our loves,
And likewise all our fears;
In hopes this declaration moves
Some pity for our tears;
Let's hear of no inconstancy,
We have too much of that at sea,
With a fa, &c.

§ 5. Song. LORD LANSDOWNE.

WHY, cruel creature, why so bent
To vex a tender heart?
To gold and title you relent;
Love throws in vain his dart.
Let glittering fops in court be great,
For pay let armies move:
Beauty should have no other bait
But gentle vows and love.
If on those endless charms you lay
The value that's their due;
Kings are themselves too poor to pay,
A thousand worlds too few.
But if a passion without vice,
Without disguise or art,
Ah, Celia! if true love's your price,
Behold it in my heart.

§ 6. Song. SIR CAR SCROOPE.

ONE night, when all the village slept,
Myrtillo's sad despair
The wretched shepherd waking kept,
To tell the woods his care:
"Begone," said he, "fond thoughts, begone!
Eyes, give your sorrows o'er!
Why should you waste your tears for one
Who thinks on you no more?
"Yet, O ye birds, ye flocks, ye pow'rs
That dwell within this grove,
Can tell how many tender hours
We here have pass'd in love!
Yon stars above (my cruel foes)
Have heard how she has sworn,
A thousand times, that, like to those,
Her flame should ever burn!
"But since she's lost, O let me have
My wish, and quickly die!
In this cold bank I'll make a grave,
And there for ever lie:
Sad nightingales the watch shall keep,
And kindly here complain."
Then down the shepherd lay to sleep,
But never rose again.

§ 7. A Pastoral Elegy.

AH, Damon, dear shepherd, adieu!
By love and first nature allied,
Together in fondness we grew;
Ah, would we together had died!

For thy faith, which resembled my own,
For thy soul, which was spotless and true,
For the joys we together have known,
Ah, Damon, dear shepherd, adieu!

What bliss can hereafter be mine?
Whomever engaging I see,
To his friendship I ne'er can incline,
For fear I should mourn him like thee.
Though the muses should crown me with art,
Though honor and fortune should join;
Since thou art denied to my heart,
What bliss can hereafter be mine?

Ah Dämon, dear shepherd, farewell!
Thy grave with sad osiers I'll bind;
Though no more in one cottage we dwell,
I can keep thee for ever in mind.
Each morning I'll visit alone
His ashes who lov'd me so well,
And murmur each eve o'er his stone,
"Ah Damon, dear shepherd, farewell!"

§ 8. Song. MOORE.

HARK! hark! 'tis a voice from the tomb!
Come, Lucy, it cries, come away!
The grave of my Colin has room
To rest thee beside his cold clay.
I come, my dear shepherd, I come;
Ye friends and companions, adieu!
I haste to my Colin's dark home,
To die on his bosom so true.

All mournful the midnight bell rung,
When Lucy, sad Lucy, arose;
And forth to the green turf she sprung,
Where Colin's pale ashes repose.
All wet with the night's chilling dew,
Her bosom embrac'd the cold ground;
While stormy winds over her blew,
And night-ravens croak'd all around.

How long, my lov'd Colin, she cried,
How long must thy Lucy complain?
How long shall the grave my love hide?
How long ere it join us again?
For thee thy fond shepherdess liv'd,
With thee o'er the world would she fly;
For thee has she sorrow'd and griev'd,
For thee would she lie down and die.

Alas! what avails it how dear
Thy Lucy was once to her swain!
Her face like the lily so fair,
And eyes that gave light to the plain!
The shepherd that lov'd her is gone,
That face and those eyes charm no more;
And Lucy, forgot and alone,
To death shall her Colin deplore.

While thus she lay sunk in despair,
And mourn'd to the echoes around,
Inflam'd all at once grew the air,
And thunder shook dreadful the ground!
I hear the kind call, and obey,
O Colin, receive me, she cried:

Then breathing a groan o'er his clay,
She hung on his tomb-stone, and died.

§ 9. Song. GAY.

'Twas when the seas were roaring
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring,
All on a rock reclin'd.
Wide o'er the foaming billows
She cast a wistful look;
Her head was crown'd with willows
That trembled o'er the brook.

Twelve months are gone and over,
And nine long tedious days;
Why didst thou, vent'rous lover,
Why didst thou trust the seas?
Cease, cease, thou cruel ocean,
And let my lover rest:
Ah! what's thy troubled motion
To that within my breast!

The merchant, robb'd of pleasure,
Views tempests in despair;
But what's the loss of treasure
To losing of my dear?
Should you some coast be laid on
Where gold and di'monds grow,
You'll find a richer maiden,
But none that loves you so.

How can they say that nature
Has nothing made in vain?
Why then beneath the water
Do hideous rocks remain?
No eyes these rocks discover,
That lurk beneath the deep,
To wreck the wand'ring lover,
And leave the maid to weep.

All melancholy lying,
Thus wail'd she for her dear;
Repaid each blast with sighing,
Each billow with a tear:
When, o'er the white wave stooping,
His floating corpse she spied;
Then, like a lily drooping,
She bow'd her head, and died.

§ 10. A Persian Song of Hafiz.

SIR WILLIAM JONES.

SWEET maid, if thou wouldst charm my sight,
And bid these arms thy neck enfold;
That rosy cheek, that lily hand,
Would give thy poet more delight
Than all Bocara's vaunted gold,
Than all the gems of Samarcand.

Boy, let yon liquid ruby flow,
And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
Whate'er the frowning zealots say:
Tell them their Eden cannot show

A stream so clear as Rocnabad,
A bower so sweet as Mosellay.

O! when these fair, perfidious maids,
Whose eyes our secret haunts infest,
Their dear destructive charms display,
Each glance my tender breast invades,
And robs my wounded soul of rest,
As Tartars seize their destin'd prey.

In vain with love our bosoms glow:
Can all our tears, can all our sighs,
New lustre to those charms impart?
Can cheeks where living roses blow,
Where Nature spreads her richest dyes,
Require the borrow'd gloss of art?

Speak not of fate:—ah! change the theme,
And talk of odors, talk of wine,
Talk of the flowers that round us bloom:
'Tis all a cloud, 'tis all a dream!
To love and joy thy thoughts confine,
Nor hope to pierce the sacred gloom.

Beauty has such resistless power,
That e'en the chaste Egyptian dame
Sigh'd for the blooming Hebrew boy;
For her how fatal was the hour,
When to the banks of Nilus came
A youth so lovely and so coy!

But ah! sweet maid, my counsel hear:
(Youth should attend when those advise Whom long experience renders sage:)
While music charms the ravish'd ear;
While sparkling cups delight our ear;
Be gay, and scorn the frowns of age.

What cruel answer have I heard!
And yet, by heaven, I love thee still:
Can aught be cruel from thy lip?
Yet say, how fell that bitter word
From lips which streams of sweetness fill,
Which nought but drops of honey sip?

Go boldly forth, my simple lay,
Whose accents flow with artless ease,
Like orient pearls at random strung:
Thy notes are sweet, the damsels say;
But O! far sweeter, if they please
The nymph for whom these notes are sung.

§ 11. Song.

HARD by the hall, our master's house,
Where Mersey flows to meet the main;
Where woods, and winds, and waves dispose
A lover to complain;

With arms across, along the strand
Poor Lycon walk'd, and hung his head;
Viewing the footsteps in the sand,
Which a bright nymph had made.

The tide, said he, will soon erase
The marks so lightly here imprest;
But time or tide will ne'er deface
Her image in my breast.

Am I some savage beast of prey,
Am I some horrid monster grown,
That thus she flies so swift away,
Or meets me with a frown?

That bosom soft, that lily skin
(Trust not the fairest outside show!)
Contains a marble heart within,
A rock hid under snow.

Ah me! the flints and pebbles wound
Her tender feet, from whence there fell
Those crimson drops which stain the ground,
And beautify each shell.

Ah! fair one, moderate thy flight,
I will no more in vain pursue,
But take my leave for a long night;
Adieu! lov'd maid, adieu.

With that he took a running leap,
He took a Lover's Leap indeed,
And plung'd into the sounding deep,
Where hungry fishes feed.

The melancholy hern stalks by;
Around the squalling sea-gulls yell;
Aloft the croaking ravens fly,
And toll his funeral bell.

The waters roll above his head,
The billows toss it o'er and o'er,
His ivory bones lie scattered,
And whiten all the shore.

§ 12. *Song. Jemmy Dawson**. SHENSTONE.

COME listen to my mournful tale,
Ye tender hearts and lovers dear;
Nor will you scorn to heave a sigh,
Nor will you blush to shed a tear.

And thou, dear Kitty, peerless maid!
Do thou a pensive ear incline;
For thou canst weep at every woe,
And pity every plaint but mine.

Young Dawson was a gallant youth,
A brighter never trod the plain;
And well he lov'd one charming maid,
And dearly was he lov'd again.

One tender maid she lov'd him dear,
Of gentle blood the damsel came:
And faultless was her beauteous form,
And spotless was her virgin fame.

But curse on party's hateful strife,
That led the favor'd youth astray!
The day the rebel clans appear'd,
O had he never seen that day!

Their colors and their sash he wore,
And in that fatal dress was found;
And now he must that death endure
Which gives the brave the keenest wound.

How pale was then his true-love's cheek,
When Jemmy's sentence reach'd her ear!
For never yet did Alpine snows
So pale, or yet so chill appear.

With faltering voice she weeping said:
"O Dawson, monarch of my heart,
Think not thy death shall end our loves,
For thou and I will never part.

"Yet might sweet mercy find a place,
And bring relief to Jemmy's woes,
O George! without a pray'r for thee
My orisons should never close.

"The gracious prince that gave him life
Would crown a never-dying flame;
And every tender babe I bore
Should learn to lisp the giver's name.

"But tho', dear youth, thou shouldst be dragg'd
To yonder ignominious tree;
Thou shalt not want a faithful friend
To share thy bitter fate with thee."

O then her mourning-coach was call'd,
The sledge mov'd slowly on before;
Though borne in his triumphal car,
She had not lov'd her favorite more.

She follow'd him, prepar'd to view
The terrible behests of law;
And the last scene of Jemmy's woes
With calm and steadfast eye she saw.

Distorted was that blooming face,
Which she had fondly lov'd so long;
And stifled was that tuneful breath,
Which in her praise had sweetly sung:

And severed was that beauteous neck,
Round which her arms had fondly clos'd;
And mangled was the beauteous breast
On which her love-sick head repos'd;

And ravish'd was that constant heart,
She did to every heart prefer;
For, though it could its king forget,
'Twas true and loyal still to her.

Amid those unrelenting flames
She bore this constant heart to see;
But when 'twas moulder'd into dust,
"Now, now," she cried, "I follow thee!"

* Captain James Dawson, the amiable and unfortunate subject of these beautiful Stanzas, was one of the eight officers belonging to the Manchester regiment of volunteers, in the service of the young Chevalier, who were hanged, drawn, and quartered, on Kennington-Common, in 1746: and this Ballad, written about the time, is founded on a remarkable circumstance which actually happened at his execution. Just before his death he wrote a song on his own misfortunes, which is supposed to be still extant.

“ My death, my death, alone can show
The pure and lasting love I bore :
Accept, O Heaven ! of woes like ours,
And let us, let us weep no more.”

The dismal scene was o'er and past,
The lover's mournful hearse retir'd ;
The maid threw back her languid head,
And, sighing forth his name, expir'd !

Though justice ever must prevail,
The tear my Kitty sheds is due ;
For seldom shall she hear a tale
So sad, so tender, and so true.

§ 13. Song. A Morning Piece: or, a Hymn for the Hay-makers. SMART.

BRISK chaunticleer his matins had begun,
And broke the silence of the night ;
And thrice he call'd aloud the tardy sun,
And thrice he hail'd the dawn's ambiguous
light ;
Back to their graves the fear-begotten phantoms run.

Strong Labour got up with his pipe in his mouth,
And stoutly strode over the dale ;
He lent new perfume to the breath of the south,
On his back hung his wallet and flail.
Behind him came Health from her cottage of thatch,
Where never physician had lifted the latch.

First of the village Colin was awake,
And thus he sung, reclining on his rake :
Now the rural Graces three
Dance beneath yon maple-tree !
First the vestal Virtue, known
By her adamant zone ;
Next to her, in rosy pride,
Sweet Society, the bride ;
Last Honesty, full seemly drest
In her cleanly homespun vest.

The abbey-bells, in wak'ning rounds,
The warning peal have given ;
And pious Gratitude resounds
Her morning hymn to Heaven.
All nature wakes ; the birds unlock their throats,
And mock the shepherd's rustic notes.
All alive o'er the lawn,
Full glad of the dawn,
The little lambkins play :
Sylvia and Sol arise, and all is day !

Come, my mates, let us work,
And all hands to the fork,
While the sun shines, our haycocks to make ;
So fine is the day,
And so fragrant the hay,
That the meadow's as blithe as the wake !

Our voice let us raise
In Phœbus's praise :
Inspir'd by so glorious a theme,
Our musical words
Shall be join'd by the birds,
And we'll dance to the tune of the stream !

§ 14. Song. Sir JOHN SUCKLING.

WHY so pale and wan, fond lover?
Pry'thee why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her,
Looking ill prevail?
Pry'thee why so pale?

Why so dull and mute, young sinner?
Pry'thee why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her,
Saying nothing do't?
Pry'thee why so mute?

Quit, quit, for shame ! this will not move,
This cannot take her ;
If of herself she will not love,
Nothing can make her ;
The devil take her.

§ 15. Song. Humphrey Gubbin's Courtship.

A COURTING I went to my love,
Who is sweeter than roses in May ;
And when I came to her, by Jove,
The devil a word could I say.
I walk'd with her into the garden,
There fully intending to woo her ;
But may I be ne'er worth a farthing,
If of love I said any thing to her.

I clasp'd her hand close to my breast,
While my heart was as light as a feather ;
Yet nothing I said, I protest,
But—“ Madam, 'tis very fine weather.”
To an arbor I did her attend,
She ask'd me to come and sit by her ;
I crept to the furthest end,
For I was afraid to come nigh her.

I ask'd her which way was the wind,
For I thought in some talk we must enter :
“ Why, Sir, (she answer'd, and grinn'd,)
Have you just sent your wits for a venture?”
Then I follow'd her into her house,
There I vow'd I my passion would try ;
But there I was still as a mouse ;
O what a dull booby was I !

§ 16. Song. The Despairing Lover. WALSH.

DISTRACTED with care,
For Phillis the fair,
Since nothing could move her,
Poor Damon, her lover,
Resolves in despair
No longer to languish,
Nor bear so much anguish ;
But, mad with his love,
To a precipice goes,
Where a leap from above
Would soon finish his woes.

When, in rage, he came there,
Beholding how steep
The sides did appear,
And the bottom how deep ;

His torments projecting,
And sadly reflecting,
That a lover forsaken,
A new love may get;
But a neck, when once broken,
Can never be set:

And that he could die
Whenever he would;
But that he could live
But as long as he could;
How grievous soever
The torment might grow,
He scorn'd to endeavour
To finish it so.
But bold, unconcern'd,
At thoughts of the pain,
He calmly return'd
To his cottage again.

§ 17. Song.

A COBBLER there was, and he liv'd in a stall
Which serv'd him for parlour, for kitchen, and hall;

No coin in his pocket, no care in his pate,
No ambition had he, nor duns at his gate.

Derry down, down, down, derry down.

Contented he work'd, and he thought himself happy

If at night he could purchase a jug of brown
nappy:

How he'd laugh then, and whistle, and sing
too, most sweet! [meet!

Saying, Just to a hair I have made both ends
Derry down, down, &c.

But love, the disturber of high and of low,
That shoots at the peasant as well as the beau;
He shot the poor cobbler quite thro' the heart;
I wish he had hit some more ignoble part.

Derry down, down, &c.

It was from a cellar this archer did play,
Where a buxom young damsel continually lay;
Her eyes shone so bright when she rose every
day,

That she shot the poor cobbler quite over the
way.

Derry down, down, &c.

He sung her love-songs as he sat at his work,
But she was as hard as a Jew or a Turk:
Whenever he spoke she would flounce and would flier,

Which put the poor cobbler quite into despair,
Derry down, down, &c.

He took up his awl that he had in the world,
And to make away with himself was resolv'd;
He pierced through his body instead of the sole,
So the cobbler he died, and the bell it did toll,
Derry down, down, &c.

And now, in good will, I advise, as a friend,
All cobblers take warning by this cobbler's end:
Keep your hearts out of love, for we find, by what's past,

That love brings us all to an end at the last,
Derry down, down, down, derry down.

§ 18. Song. MOORE.

WHEN Damon languish'd at my feet,
And I believ'd him true,
The moments of delight how sweet!
But oh! how swift they flew!

The sunny hill, the flow'ry vale,
The garden, and the grove,
Have echo'd to his ardent tale,
And vows of endless love.

The conquest gain'd, he left his prize,
He left her to complain;
To talk of joy with weeping eyes,
And measure time by pain.

But Heaven will take the mourner's part,
In pity to despair;
And the last sigh that rends the heart
Shall waft the spirit there.

§ 19. Song. The Lass of the Hill.
MISS MARY JONES.

ON the brow of a hill a young shepherdess dwelt,

Who no pangs of ambition or love had e'er felt:
For a few sober maxims still ran in her head,
That 'twas better to earn ere she ate her brown bread;

That to rise with the lark was conducive to health,

And to folks in a cottage, contentment was wealth.

Now young Roger, who liv'd in the valley
below,

Who at church and at market was reckon'd a beau,

Had many times tried o'er her heart to prevail,
And would rest on his pitchfork to tell her his tale: [heart;

With his winning behaviour he melted her
But, quite artless herself, she suspected no art.

He had sigh'd, and protested, had kneel'd and implor'd,

And could lie with the grandeur and air of a
lord:

Then her eyes he commended in language well
dress'd,

And enlarg'd on the torments that troubled his
breast;

Till his sighs and his tears had so wrought on her mind,

That in downright compassion to love she in-clin'd.

But as soon as he melted the ice of her breast,
All the flames of his love in a moment decreas'd;
And at noon he goes flaunting all over the vale,
Where he boasts of his conquest to Susan and Nell:

Though he sees her but seldom, he's always in haste,

And, if ever he mentions her, makes her his jest.

All the day she goes sighing, and hanging her head,
 And her thoughts are so pester'd, she scarce
 earns her bread;
 The whole village cries shame, when a-milking
 she goes,
 That so little affection is shown to the cows:
 But she heeds not their railing, e'en let them rail on,
 And a fig for the cows now her sweetheart is gone.
 Now beware, ye young virgins of Britain's gay
 isle,
 How ye yield up a heart to a look or a smile:
 For Cupid is artful, and virgins are frail,
 And you'll find a false Roger in every vale,
 Who to court you, and tempt you, will try all his skill;
 But remember The Lass on the brow of the Hill.

§ 20. Song. BARTON BOOTH, Esq.

SWEET are the charms of her I love,
 More fragrant than the damask rose,
 Soft as the down of turtle dove,
 Gentle as air when Zephyr blows,
 Refreshing as descending rains
 To sun-burnt climes and thirsty plains.
 True as the needle to the pole,
 Or "as the dial to the sun;"
 Constant as gliding waters roll,
 Whose swelling tides obey the moon!
 From ev'ry other charmer free,
 My life and love shall follow thee.
 The lamb the flow'ry thyme devours,
 The dam the tender kid pursues;
 Sweet Philomel, in shady bow'rs
 Of verdant spring, her note renews;
 All follow what they most admire,
 As I pursue my soul's desire.
 Nature must change her beauteous face,
 And vary as the seasons rise;
 As winter to the spring gives place,
 Summer th' approach of autumn flies;
 No change in love the seasons bring,
 Love only knows perpetual spring.
 Devouring time, with stealing pace,
 Makes lofty oaks and cedars bow;
 And marble tow'rs, and gates of brass,
 In his rude march he levels low:
 But time destroying far and wide,
 Love from the soul can ne'er divide.
 Death only with his cruel dart
 The gentle godhead can remove;
 And drive him from the bleeding heart,
 To mingle with the bless'd above;
 Where known to all his kindred train,
 He finds a lasting rest from pain.
 Love, and his sister fair, the Soul,
 Twin-born, from heaven together came;
 Love will the universe control,
 When dying seasons lose their name;
 Divine abodes shall own his pow'r,
 When time and death shall be no more.

§ 21. Song. PARNELL.

My days have been so wondrous free,
 The little birds that fly
 With careless ease from tree to tree
 Were but as bless'd as I.
 Ask gliding waters, if a tear
 Of mine increas'd their stream?
 Or ask the flying gales, if e'er
 I lent a sigh to them?
 But now my former days retire,
 And I'm by beauty caught;
 The tender chains of sweet desire
 Are fix'd upon my thought.
 An eager hope within my breast
 Does every doubt controul;
 And lovely Nancy stands confest
 The fav'rite of my soul.
 Ye nightingales, ye twisting pines,
 Ye swains that haunt the grove,
 Ye gentle echoes, breezy winds,
 Ye close retreats of love!
 With all of nature, all of art,
 Assist the dear design;
 O teach a young, unpractis'd heart,
 To make her ever mine.

The very thought of change I hate
 As much as of despair;
 Nor ever covet to be great,
 Unless it be for her.

'Tis true, the passion in my mind
 Is mix'd with soft distress:
 Yet, while the fair I love is kind,
 I cannot wish it less.

§ 22. Song. May Eve; or, Kate of Aberdeen.
 CUNNINGHAM.

THE silver moon's enamor'd beam
 Steals softly through the night,
 To wanton with the winding stream,
 And kiss reflected light.
 To beds of state go, balmy sleep,
 ('Tis where you've seldom been)
 May's vigil while the shepherds keep With Kate of Aberdeen.
 Upon the green the virgins wait,
 In rosy chaplets gay,
 Till morn unbar her golden gate,
 And give the promis'd May.
 Methinks I hear the maids declare
 The promis'd May, when seen,
 Not half so fragrant, half so fair
 As Kate of Aberdeen.
 Strike up the tabor's boldest notes,
 We'll rouse the nodding grove;
 The nested birds shall raise their throats,
 And hail the maid I love.
 And see, the matin lark mistakes,
 He quits the tufted green:
 Fond bird! 'tis not the morning breaks,
 'Tis Kate of Aberdeen!

Now lightsome o'er the level mead,
Where midnight Fairies rove,
Like them the jocund dance we'll lead,
Or tune the reed to love.
For see, the rosy May draws nigh!
She claims a virgin queen;
And hark, the happy shepherds cry,
'Tis Kate of Aberdeen!

§ 23. Song. Sally in our Alley. CAREY.

OF all the girls that are so smart,
There's none like pretty Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.
There's ne'er a lady in the land,
That's half so sweet as Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

Her father he makes cabbage-nets,
And through the streets does cry 'em:
Her mother she sells laces long,
To such as choose to buy 'em:
But sure such folks could ne'er beget
So sweet a girl as Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

When she is by I leave my work,
I love her so sincerely;
My master comes, like any Turk,
And bangs me most severely;
But let him bang his bellyfull,
I'll bear it all for Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

Of all the days that's in the week,
I dearly love but one day;
And that's the day that comes betwixt
A Saturday and Monday;
For then I'm dress'd, all in my best,
To walk abroad with Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

My master carries me to church,
And often am I blamed,
Because I leave him in the lurch,
As soon as text is named:
I leave the church in sermon time,
And slink away to Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

When Christmas comes about again,
Oh! then I shall have money;
I'll hoard it up, and box and all,
I'll give it to my honey.
And would it were ten thousand pound,
I'd give it all to Sally:
She is the darling of my heart,
And she lives in our alley.

My master and the neighbours all
Make game of me and Sally;

And but for her, I'd better be
A slave, and row a galley.
But, when my seven long years are out,
O then I'll marry Sally:
O then we'll wed, and then we'll bed,
But not in our alley.

§ 24. Song. The true Tar. By the same.

A KNAVE's a knave,
Though ne'er so brave,
Though diamonds round him shine;
What though he's great,
Takes mighty state,
And thinks himself divine?
His ill-got wealth
Can't give him health,
Or future ills prevent:
An honest tar
Is richer far,
If he enjoys content.

A soul sincere
Scorns fraud or fear,
Within itself secure;
For vice will blast,
But virtue last
While truth and time endure.
Blow high, blow low,
Frown fate or foe,
He scorns to tack about;
But to his trust
Is strictly just,
And nobly stems it out.

§ 25. Song. JOHNSON.

NOT the soft sighs of vernal gales,
The fragrance of the flowery vales,
The murmurs of the crystal rill,
The vocal grove, the verdant hill;
Not all their charms, though all unite,
Can touch my bosom with delight.
Not all the gems on India's shore,
Not all Peru's unbounded store;
Not all the pow'r, nor all the fame,
That heroes, kings, or poets claim;
Nor knowledge, which the learn'd approve,
To form one wish my soul can move.
Yet nature's charms allure my eyes,
And knowledge, wealth, and fame I prize;
Fame, wealth, and knowledge I obtain,
Nor seek I nature's charms in vain;
In lovely Stella all combine,
And, lovely Stella! thou art mine.

§ 26. Delia. A Pastoral. CUNNINGHAM.

THE gentle swan, with graceful pride,
Her glossy plumage laves,
And, sailing down the silver tide,
Divides the whispering waves:

The silver tide, that wandering flows,
Sweet to the bird must be!
But not so sweet, blithe Cupid knows,
As Delia is to me.

A parent-bird, in plaintive mood,
On yonder fruit-tree sung,
And still the pendant nest she view'd
That held her callow young:
Dear to the mother's fluttering heart
The genial brood must be;
But not so dear, the thousandth part,
As Delia is to me.

The roses that my brow surround
Were natives of the dale;
Scarce pluck'd, and in a garland bound,
Before their sweets grew pale!
My vital bloom would thus be froze,
If luckless torn from thee;
For what the root is to the rose,
My Delia is to me.

Two doves I found, like new-fall'n snow,
So white the beauteous pair;
The birds on Delia I'll bestow,
They're, like her bosom, fair!
When, in their chaste connubial love,
My secret wish she'll see;
Such mutual bliss as turtles prove,
May Delia share with me.

§ 27. Song. AKENSIDE.

THE shape alone let others prize,
The features of the fair;
I look for spirit in her eyes,
And meaning in her air.

A damask cheek, and iv'ry arm,
Shall ne'er my wishes win:
Give me an animated form,
That speaks a mind within:

A face where awful honor shines,
Where sense and sweetness move,
And angel innocence refines
The tenderness of love.

These are the soul of beauty's frame,
Without whose vital aid
Unfinish'd all her features seem,
And all her roses dead.

But ah! where both their charms unite,
How perfect is the view,
With ev'ry image of delight,
With graces ever new!

Of pow'r to charm the greatest woe,
The wildest rage control;
Diffusing mildness o'er the brow,
And rapture through the soul.

Their pow'r but faintly to express
All language must despair;
But go, behold Arpasia's face,
And read it perfect there.

§ 28. Song. On Young Orinda.

WHEN innocence and beauty meet,
To add to lovely female grace,
Ah, how beyond expression sweet
Is every feature of the face!

By virtue ripen'd from the bud,
The flow'r angelic odours breeds:
The fragrant charm of being good
Makes gaudy vice to smell like weeds.

O sacred Virtue! tune my voice
With thy inspiring harmony;
Then I shall sing of rapturous joys,
Which fill my soul with love of thee:

To lasting brightness be refin'd,
When this vain shadow flies away;
Th' eternal beauties of the mind
Will last when all things else decay.

§ 29. Song. From the Lapland Tongue.
STEELE.

THOU rising sun, whose gladsome ray
Invites my fair to rural play,
Dispel the mist, and clear the skies,
And bring my Orra to my eyes.

O were I sure my dear to view,
I'd climb that pine-tree's topmost bough,
Aloft in air that quiv'ring plays,
And round and round for ever gaze.

My Orra Moor, where art thou laid?
What wood conceals my sleeping maid?
Fast by the roots, enrag'd, I'd tear
The trees that hide my promis'd fair.

O could I ride on clouds and skies,
Or on the raven's pinions rise!
Ye storks, ye swans, a moment stay,
And waft a lover on his way!

My bliss too long my bride denies:
Apace the wasting summer flies:
Nor yet the wintry blasts I fear,
Nor storms nor night shall keep me here.

What may for strength with steel compare?
O, Love has fetters stronger far!
By bolts of steel are limbs confin'd,
But cruel Love enchains the mind.

No longer then perplex thy breast;
When thoughts torment, the first are best;
'Tis mad to go, 'tis death to stay:
Away to Orra, haste away!

§ 30. Song. The Midsummer Wish.
CROXALL.

WAPT me, some soft and cooling breeze,
To Windsor's shady, kind retreat;
Where sylvan scenes, wide spreading trees,
Repel the dog-star's raging heat:

Where tufted grass, and mossy beds,
Afford a rural, calm repose;
Where woodbines hang their dewy heads,
And fragrant sweets around disclose.

Old oozy Thames, that flows fast by,
Along the smiling valley plays,
His glassy surface cheers the eye,
And through the flow'ry meadow strays.

His fertile banks with herbage green,
His vales with golden plenty swell;
Where'er his purer streams are seen,
The gods of health and pleasure dwell.

Let me thy clear, thy yielding wave
With naked arm once more divide;
In thee my glowing bosom lave,
And stem thy gently-rolling tide.

Lay me, with damask roses crown'd,
Beneath some osier's dusky shade:
Where water-lilies deck the ground,
Where bubbling springs refresh the glade.

§ 31. Song. MISS WHATELEY.

COME, dear Pastora, come away!
And hail the cheerful spring:
Now fragrant blossoms crown the May,
And woods with love-notes ring:
Now Phœbus to the west descends,
And sheds a fainter ray;
And, as our rural labor ends,
We bless the closing day.

In yonder artless maple bow'r
With blooming woodbines twin'd,
Let us enjoy the evening hour,
On earth's soft lap reclin'd:
Or where yon poplar's verdant boughs
The crystal current shade;
O deign, fair nymph, to hear the vows
My faithful heart has made.

Within this breast no soft deceit,
No artful flatt'ry bides:
But truth, scarce known among the great,
O'er ev'ry thought presides:
On pride's false glare I look with scorn,
And all its glittering train;
Be mine the pleasures which adorn
This ever-peaceful plain.

Come then, my fair, and with thy love
Each rising care subdue;
Thy presence can each grief remove,
And ev'ry joy renew.
The lily fades, the rose grows faint,
Their transient bloom is vain;
But lasting truth and virtue paint
Pastora of the plain.

§ 32. Song.

COME, dear Amanda, quit the town,
And to the rural hamlets fly;
Behold, the wintry storms are gone,
A gentle radiance glads the sky.
The birds awake, the flowers appear,
Earth spreads a verdant couch for thee;
'Tis joy and music all we hear!
'Tis love and beauty all we see!

Come, let us mark the gradual spring,
How peep the buds, the blossom blows,
Till Philomel begins to sing,
And perfect May to spread the rose.
Let us secure the short delight,
And wisely crop the blooming day;
For soon, too soon, it will be night:
Arise, my love, and come away.

§ 33. Song. From the Lapland Tongue.
STEELE.

HASTE, my rein-deer, and let us nimbly go
Our am'rous journey through this dreary waste:
Haste, my rein-deer! still, still thou art too
slow! [haste.
Impetuous love demands the lightning's

Around us far the rushy moors are spread:
Soon will the sun withdraw his cheerful ray;
Darkling and tir'd we shall the marshes tread,
No lay unsung to cheat the tedious way.

The wat'ry length of these unjoyous moors
Does all the flow'ry meadows' pride excel;
Through these I fly to her my soul adores;
Ye flow'ry meadows, empty pride, farewell!

Each moment from the charmer I'm confin'd,
My breast is tortur'd with impatient fires;
Fly, my rein-deer, fly swifter than the wind!
Thy tardy feet wing with my fierce desires.

Our pleasing toil will then be soon o'erpaid,
And thou, in wonder lost, shalt view my fair,
Admire each feature of the lovely maid,
Her artless charms, her bloom, her sprightly
air.

§ 34. Song. Arno's Vale.
EARL OF MIDDLESEX.*

WHEN here, Lucinda, first we came,
Where Arno rolls his silver stream,
How blithe the nymphs, the swains how gay!
Content inspir'd each rural lay.
The birds in livelier concert sung,
The grapes in thicker clusters hung;
All look'd as joy could never fail
Among the sweets of Arno's vale.

* Charles Sackville, afterwards Duke of Dorset. It was written at Florence in 1737, on the death of John Gaston, the late Duke of Tuscany, of the house of Medici; and addressed to Signora Muscovita, a singer, a favorite of the author's.

But since the good Palemon died,
The chief of shepherds, and their pride,
Now Arno's sons must all give place
To northern men, an iron race.
The taste of pleasure now is o'er;
Thy notes, Lucinda, please no more;
The muses droop, the Goths prevail!
Adieu, the sweets of Arno's vale!

§ 35. Song. The passionate Shepherd to his Love.
MARLOW.

COME live with me, and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove
That valleys, groves, or hills and fields,
And all the steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers, to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.

And I will make thee beds of roses,
And a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle
Embroider'd all with leaves of mirtle:

A gown made of the finest wool,
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair lined slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold:

A belt of straw, and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come, live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains shall dance and sing
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me, and be my love.

§ 36. Song. The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd.
SIR W. RALEIGH.

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel becometh dumb;
The rest complain of cares to come.

The flow'rs do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reck'ning yields;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy posies,
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten,
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw, and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps, and amber studs,

All these to me no means can move
To come to thee, and be thy love.

But could youth last, and love still breed,
Had joy no date, nor age no need;
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee, and be thy love.

§ 37. Song. Summer.
THOMAS BREREWOOD, Esq.

WHERE the light cannot pierce, in a grove of tall trees,

With my fair one as blooming as May,
Undisturb'd by all sound but the sighs of the breeze,

Let me pass the hot noon of the day.

When the sun, less intense, to the westward
inclines,

For the meadows the groves we'll forsake,
And see the rays dance, as inverted he shines,
On the face of some river or lake:

Where my fairest and I, on its verge as we pass
(For 'tis she that must still be my theme),
Our shadows may view on the watery glass,
While the fish are at play in the stream.

May the herds cease to low, and the lambs
to bleat,

When she sings me some amorous strain;
All be silent and hush'd, unless Echo repeat
The kind words and sweet sounds back again!

And when we return to our cottage at night,
Hand-in-hand as we sauntering stray,
Let the moon's silver beams through the leaves
give us light,

Just direct us, and chequer our way.

Let the nightingale warble its notes in our walk,
As thus gently and slowly we move;
And let no single thought be express'd in our talk,

But of friendship improv'd into love.

Thus enchanted each day with these rural delights,

And secure from ambition's alarms,
Soft love and repose shall divide all our nights,
And each morning shall rise with new charms.

§ 38. Song. MOORE.

How bless'd has my time been, what joys have I known,
Since wedlock's soft bondage made Jesse my
own!

So joyful my heart is, so easy my chain,
That freedom is tasteless, and roving a pain.

Through walks grown with woodbines as often
we stray,

Around us our boys and girls frolic and play:
How pleasing their sport is, the wanton ones see,
And borrow their looks from my Jesse and me.

To try her sweet temper, sometimes am I seen
In revels all day with the nymphs of the green;
Though painful my absence, my doubts she beguiles,
And meets me at night with compliance and smiles.

What though on her cheeks the rose loses its hue,
Her wit and good-humour bloom all the year through;
Time still, as he flies, adds increase to her truth,
And gives to her mind what he steals from her youth.

Ye shepherds so gay, who make love to ensnare,
And cheat with false vows the too credulous fair,
In search of true pleasure how vainly you roam!
To hold it for life, you must find it at home.

§ 39. A Song. FITZGERALD.

THE charms which blooming beauty shows
From faces heavenly fair,
We to the lily and the rose,
With semblance apt, compare.

With semblance apt; for, ah! how soon,
How soon they all decay!
The lily droops, the rose is gone,
And beauty fades away.

But when bright virtue shines confess'd,
With sweet discretion join'd;
When mildness calms the peaceful breast,
And wisdom guides the mind:

When charms like these, dear maid, conspire
Thy person to approve,
They kindle generous chaste desire,
And everlasting love.

Beyond the reach of time or fate
These graces shall endure;
Still, like the passion they create,
Eternal, constant, pure.

§ 40. Song.

BUSY, curious, thirsty fly,
Drink with me, and drink as I:
Freely welcome to my cup,
Couldst thou sip and sip it up:
Make the most of life you may;
Life is short, and wears away.
Both alike are mine and thine,
Hastening quick to their decline:
Thine's a summer, mine no more,
Though repeated to threescore;
Threescore summers, when they're gone,
Will appear as short as one.

§ 41. Song.

HAD Neptune, when first he took charge of the sea,
Been as wise, or at least been as merry, as we,

He'd have thought better on't, and instead of his brine [wine.
Would have fill'd the vast ocean with generous What trafficking then would have been on the
main,
For the sake of good liquor as well as for gain!
No fear then of tempests, or danger of sinking;
The fishes ne'er drown that are always a-drinking.

The hot thirsty sun then would drive with more haste,
Secure in the evening of such a repast;
And when he'd got tipsy would have taken his
With double the pleasure in Thetis's lap. [nap

By the force of his rays, and thus heated with wine,
Consider how gloriously Phœbus would shine;
What vast exhalations he'd draw up on high,
To relieve the poor earth as it wanted supply.

How happy us mortals, when bless'd with such rain,
To fill all our vessels, and fill them again!
Nay even the beggar, that has ne'er a dish,
Might jump into the river, and drink like a fish.

What mirth and contentment on ev'ry one's brow, [plough!
Hob as great as a prince dancing after the
The birds in the air, as they play on the wing,
Although they but sip, would eternally sing.

The stars, who, I think, don't to drinking incline,
Would frisk and rejoice at the fume of the wine;
And, merrily twinkling, would soon let us
know
That they were as happy as mortals below.

Had this been the case, then what had we enjoy'd,
Our spirits still rising, our fancy ne'er cloy'd;
A pox then on Neptune, when 'twas in his pow'r,
To slip, like a fool, such a fortunate hour!

§ 42. A Song. SHENSTONE.

ADIEU, ye jovial youths, who join
To plunge old Care in floods of wine;
And, as your dazzled eye-balls roll,
Discern him struggling in the bowl!

Not yet is hope so wholly flown,
Not yet is thought so tedious grown,
But limpid streams and shady tree
Retain as yet some sweets for me.

And see, through yonder silent grove,
See yonder does my Daphne rove:
With pride her footsteps I pursue,
And bid your frantic joys adieu.

The sole confusion I admire,
Is that my Daphne's eyes inspire:
I scorn the madness you approve,
And value reason next to love.

§ 43. Song.

My mind to me a kingdom is ;
 Such perfect joy therein I find,
 As far exceeds all earthly bliss,
 That God or nature hath assign'd :
 Though much I want that most would have,
 Yet still my mind forbids to crave.

Content I live, this is my stay ;
 I seek no more than may suffice :
 I press to bear no haughty sway ;
 Look what I lack my mind supplies.
 Lo ! thus I triumph like a king,
 Content with that my mind doth bring.

I see how plenty surfeits oft,
 And hasty climbers soonest fall :
 I see that such as sit aloft
 Mishap doth threaten most of all :
 These get with toil, and keep with fear :
 Such cares my mind could never bear.

No princely pomp, nor wealthy store,
 No force to win a victory,
 No wily wit to salve a sore,
 No shape to win a lover's eye :
 To none of these I yield as thrall,
 For why ? my mind despiseth all.

Some have too much, yet still they crave ;
 I little have, yet seek no more :
 They are but poor, though much they have ;
 And I am rich with little store :
 They poor, I rich ; they beg, I give ;
 They lack, I lend ; they pine, I live.

I laugh not at another's loss,
 I grudge not at another's gain ;
 No worldly wave my mind can toss,
 I brook that is another's bane.
 I fear no foe, nor fawn no friend ;
 I loathe not life, nor dread mine end.

My wealth is health, and perfect ease :
 My conscience clear my chief defence :
 I never seek by bribes to please,
 Nor by desert to give offence :
 Thus do I live, thus will I die ;
 Would all did so as well as I !

I take no joy in earthly bliss ;
 I weigh not Cræsus' wealth a straw ;
 For care, I know not what it is ;
 I fear not Fortune's fatal law.
 My mind is such as may not move
 For beauty bright, or force of love.

I wish but what I have at will ;
 I wander not to seek for more ;
 I like the plain, I climb no hill ;
 In greatest storms I sit on shore,
 And laugh at them that toil in vain
 To get what must be lost again.

I kiss not where I wish to kill ;
 I feign not love where most I hate ;
 I break no sleep to win my will ;
 I wait not at the mighty's gate ;
 I scorn no poor, I fear no rich ;
 I feel no want, nor have too much.

The court ne cart, I like ne loathe :
 Extremes are counted worst of all :
 The golden mean betwixt them both
 Doth surest sit, and fears no fall ;
 This is my choice ; for why ? I find
 No wealth is like a quiet mind.

§ 44. Song. COUNTESS OF WINCHELSEA.

WOULD we attain the happier state
 That is design'd us here ;
 No joy a rapture must create,
 No grief beget despair :
 No injury fierce anger raise,
 No honor tempt to pride :
 No vain desires of empty praise
 Must in the soul abide :
 No charms of youth or beauty move
 The constant, settled breast :
 Who leaves a passage free to love
 Shall let in all the rest.
 In such a heart soft peace will live,
 Where none of these abound ;
 The greatest blessing Heaven does give,
 Or can on earth be found.

§ 45. Song. BEDINGFIELD.

To hug yourself in perfect ease,
 What would you wish for more than these ?
 A healthy, clean, paternal seat,
 Well shaded from the summer's heat :
 A little parlour-stove, to hold
 A constant fire from winter's cold,
 Where you may sit and think, and sing,
 Far off from court, God bless the king :
 Safe from the harpies of the law,
 From party-rage, and great man's paw ;
 Have choice few friends of your own taste ;
 A wife agreeable and chaste :
 An open, but yet cautious mind,
 Where guilty cares no entrance find ;
 Nor miser's fears, nor envy's spite,
 To break the sabbath of the night :
 Plain equipage, and temp'rate meals,
 Few tailors', and no doctors' bills ;
 Content to take, as Heaven shall please,
 A longer or a shorter lease.

§ 46. Song. MISS PILKINGTON.

I ENVY not the proud their wealth,
 Their equipage and state :
 Give me but innocence and health,
 I ask not to be great.
 I in this sweet retirement find
 A joy unknown to kings,
 For sceptres to a virtuous mind
 Seem vain and empty things.

Great Cincinnatus at his plough
With brighter lustre shone,
Than guilty Cæsar e'er could show,
Though seated on a throne.

Tumultuous joys and restless nights
Ambition ever knows,
A stranger to the calm delights
Of study and repose.

Then free from envy, care, and strife,
Keep me, ye pow'rs divine!
And pleas'd, when ye demand my life,
May I that life resign!

§ 47. Song. The Character of a happy Life.
SIR HENRY WOTTON.

How happy is he born and taught,
That serveth not another's will;
Whose armour is his honest thought,
And simple truth his utmost skill;

Whose passions not his masters are,
Whose soul is still prepar'd for death:
Untied unto the world by care
Of public fame, or private breath!

Who envies none that chance doth raise,
Nor vice hath ever understood;
How deepest wounds are giv'n by praise,
Nor rules of state, but rules of good!

Who hath his life from rumors freed,
Whose conscience is his strong retreat;
Whose state can neither flatterers feed,
Nor ruin make oppressors great!

Who God doth late and early pray
More of his grace than gifts to lend;
And entertains the harmless day
With a religious book or friend!

This man is freed from servile hands,
Of hope to rise, or fear to fall:
Lord of himself, though not of lands,
And having nothing, yet hath all.

§ 48. Song. HILDEBRAND JACOB, Esq.

I ENVY not the mighty great,
Those pow'rful rulers of the state,
Who settle nations as they please,
And govern at th' expense of ease.

Far happier the shepherd swain,
Who daily drudges on the plain,
And nightly in some humble shed
On rushy pillows lays his head.

No curst ambition breaks his rest,
No factious wars divide his breast;

His flocks, his pipe, and artless fair,
Are all his hope, and all his care

§ 49. Song.

No glory I covet, no riches I want,
Ambition is nothing to me;
The one thing I beg of kind Heaven to grant,
Is a mind independent and free.

With passions unruffled, untainted with pride,
By reason my life let me square;
The wants of my nature are cheaply supplied,
And the rest are but folly and care.

The blessings which Providence freely has lent,
I'll justly and gratefully prize;
Whilst sweet meditation, and cheerful content,
Shall make me both healthful and wise.

In the pleasures the great man's possessions display,
Unenvied I'll challenge my part;
For ev'ry fair object my eyes can survey
Contributes to gladden my heart.

How vainly, through infinite trouble and strife,
The many their labors employ!
Since all that is truly delightful in life
Is what all, if they please, may enjoy.

§ 50. *Song. DR. DARLTON*.*

NOR on beds of fading flow'rs,
Shedding soon their gaudy pride,
Nor with swains in syren bow'rs,
Will true pleasure long reside.

On awful virtue's hill sublime
Enthroned sits th' immortal fair:
Who wins her height must patient climb;
The steps are peril, toil, and care.

So from the first did Jove ordain
Eternal bliss for transient pain.

§ 51. Song. A Moral Thought.
DR. HAWKESWORTH.

THROUGH groves sequester'd, dark, and still,
Low vales, and mossy cells among,
In silent paths the careless rill
With languid murmurs steals along.

A while it plays with circling sweep,
And ling'ring leaves its native plain;
Then pours impetuous down the steep,
And mingles with the boundless main.

* In the Masque of Comus. It seems to be imitated from a passage in the 17th book of Tasso's Jerusalem.

O let my years thus devious glide
 Through silent scenes obscurely calm;
 Nor wealth nor strife pollute the tide,
 Nor honor's sanguinary palm.
 When labor tires, and pleasure palls,
 Still let the stream untroubled be,
 As down the steep of age it falls,
 And mingles with eternity.

§ 52. Song.

FROM the court to the cottage convey me away,
 For I'm weary of grandeur, and what they call gay;
 Where pride without measure,
 And pomp without pleasure,
 Make life in a circle of hurry decay.
 Far remote and retir'd from the noise of the town,
 I'll exchange my brocade for a plain russet gown:
 My friends shall be few,
 But well chosen and true,
 And sweet recreation our evening shall crown.
 With a rural repast, a rich banquet for me,
 On a mossy green turf, near some shady old tree,
 The river's clear brink
 Shall afford me my drink,
 And temp'rance my friendly physician shall be.
 Ever calm and serene, with contentment still blest,
 Not too giddy with joy, or with sorrow deprest,
 I'll neither invoke,
 Or repine at death's stroke,
 But retire from the world as I would to my rest.

§ 53. Song. The Blind Boy.
 COLLEY CIBBER*.

O SAY what is that thing call'd light,
 Which I must ne'er enjoy?
 What are the blessings of the sight?
 O tell your poor blind boy!
 You talk of wondrous things you see,
 You say the sun shines bright;
 I feel him warm, but how can he
 Or make it day or night?
 My day or night myself I make,
 Whene'er I sleep or play;
 And could I ever keep awake,
 With me 'twere always day.
 With heavy sighs I often hear
 You mourn my hapless woe;
 But sure with patience I can bear
 A loss I ne'er can know.
 Then let not what I cannot have
 My cheer of mind destroy:
 Whilst thus I sing, I am a king,
 Although a poor blind boy.

§ 54. Song. ROBERT DODSLEY†.

How happy a state does the miller possess,
 Who would be no greater, nor fears to be less!
 On his mill and himself he depends for support,
 Which is better than servilely cringing at court.
 What though he all dusty and whiten'd does go,
 The more he's be-powder'd, the more like a beau:
 A clown in his dress may be honester far
 Than a courtier who struts in his garter and star.
 Though his hands are so daub'd they're not fit to be seen,
 The hands of his betters are not very clean:
 A palm more polite may as dirtily deal;
 Gold, in handling, will stick to the fingers like meal.
 What if, when a pudding for dinner he lacks,
 He cribs without scruple from other men's sacks;
 In this of right noble example he brags,
 Who borrow as freely from other men's bags.
 Or should he endeavour to heap an estate,
 In this he would mimic the tools of the state;
 Whose aim is alone their own coffers to fill,
 As all his concern's to bring grist to his mill.
 He eats when he's hungry, he drinks when he's
 dry,
 And down, when he's weary, contented does lie;
 Then rises up cheerful to work and to sing:
 If so happy a miller, then who'd be a king?

§ 55. Song. The Old Man's Wish. DR. POPE.

If I live to grow old, for I find I go down,
 Let this be my fate:—In a country town
 May I have a warm house, with a stone at the gate,
 And a cleanly young girl to rub my bald pate!
 May I govern my passion with an absolute
 sway,
 And grow wiser and better as my strength
 wears away,
 Without gout or stone, by a gentle decay!
 Near a shady grove, and a murmuring brook,
 With the ocean at distance, whereon I may look;
 With a spacious plain, without hedge or stile,
 And an easy pad-nag to ride out a mile.
 May I govern, &c.
 With Horace, and Petrarch, and two or three
 more
 Of the best wits that reign'd in the ages before;
 With roast mutton, rather than ven'son or teal,
 And clean, though coarse, linen at ev'ry meal.
 May I govern, &c.
 With a pudding on Sundays, with stout humming liquor,
 And remnants of Latin to welcome the vicar;
 With Monte Fiascone, or Burgundy wine,
 To drink the king's health as oft as I dine.
 May I govern, &c.

* Written for, and set by, the late celebrated Mr. Stanley, organist of St. Andrew, Holborn;
 † In the entertainment of the Miller of Mansfield.

With a courage undaunted may I face my last day;
And, when I am dead, may the better sort say,
In the morning when sober, in the evening
when mellow,
He's gone, and [has] left not behind him his
fellow:
For he govern'd his passion with an absolute
sway,
And grew wiser and better as his strength wore
away,
Without gout or stone by a gentle decay.

§ 56. Song. Time's Alteration.

WHEN this old cap was new,
'Tis since two hundred year,
No malice then we knew,
But all things plenty were;
All friendship now decays
(Believe me this is true),
Which was not in those days
When this old cap was new.

The nobles of our land
Were much delighted then
To have at their command
A crew of lusty men,
Which by their coats were known
Of tawny, red, or blue,
With crests on their sleeves shown,
When this old cap was new.

Now pride hath banish'd all,
Unto our land's reproach,
When he whose means are small
Maintains both horse and coach;
Instead of a hundred men,
The coach allows but two;
This was not thought on then,
When this old cap was new.

Good hospitality
Was cherish'd then of many;
Now poor men starve and die,
And are not help'd by any:
For charity waxeth cold,
And love is found in few;
This was not in time of old,
When this old cap was new.

Where'er you travell'd then,
You might meet on the way
Brave knights and gentlemen,
Clad in their country grey,
That courteous would appear,
And kindly welcome you:
No puritans then were,
When this old cap was new.

Our ladies, in those days,
In civil habit went;
Broad-cloth was then worth praise,
And gave the best content:

French fashions then were scorn'd,
Fond fangles then none knew,
Then modesty women adorn'd,
When this old cap was new.

A man might then behold
At Christmas, in each hall,
Good fires to curb the cold,
And meat for great and small:
The neighbours were friendly bidden,
And all had welcome true,
The poor from the gates were not chidden,
When this old cap was new.

Black jacks to ev'ry man
Were fill'd with wine and beer,
No pewter pot, nor can,
In those days did appear:
Good cheer in a nobleman's house
Was counted a seemly show;
We wanted no brawn or souse,
When this old cap was new.

We took not such delight
In cups of silver fine:
None under degree of a knight
In plate drank beer or wine:
Now each mechanical man
Hath a cupboard of plate for a shew,
Which was a rare thing then
When this old cap was new.

Then brib'ry was unborn,
No simony men did use;
Christians did usury scorn,
Devis'd among the Jews:
The lawyers to be fee'd
At that time hardly knew,
For man with man agreed,
When this old cap was new.

No captain then carous'd,
Nor spent poor soldiers' pay;
They were not so abus'd
As they are at this day:
Of seven days they make eight,
To keep them from their due;
Poor soldiers had their right
When this old cap was new;

Which made them forward still
To go, although not press'd;
And going with good-will,
Their fortunes were the best.
Our English then in fight
Did foreign foes subdue,
And forc'd them all to flight,
When this old cap was new.

God save our gracious king,
And send him long to live!
Lord, mischief on them bring
That will not their alms give;
But seek to rob the poor
Of that which is their due:
This was not in time of yore,
When this old cap was new.

§ 57. Song. The Vicar of Bray.

IN good king Charles's golden days,
 When loyalty no harm meant,
 A zealous high-churchman I was,
 And so I got preferment:
 To teach my flock I never miss'd,
 Kings are by God appointed,
 And damn'd are those that do resist
 Or touch the Lord's Anointed.
 And this is law I will maintain
 Until my dying day, sir—
 That whatsoever king shall reign,
 I'll be the vicar of Bray, sir.

When Royal James obtain'd the crown,
 And popery came in fashion,
 The penal laws I hooted down,
 And read the Declaration:
 The church of Rome I found would fit
 Full well my constitution;
 And had become a Jesuit,
 But for the Revolution.
 And this is law, &c.

When William was our king declar'd,
 To ease the nation's grievance;
 With this new wind about I steer'd,
 And swore to him allegiance:
 Old principles I did revoke,
 Set conscience at a distance;
 Passive obedience was a joke,
 A jest was non-resistance.
 And this is law, &c.

When gracious Anne became our queen,
 The church of England's glory,
 Another face of things was seen,
 And I became a tory:
 Occasional conformists base,
 I damn'd their moderation;
 And thought the church in danger was
 By such prevarication.
 And this is law, &c.

When George in pudding time came o'er,
 And mod'rate men look'd big, sir!
 I turn'd a cat-in-pan once more,
 And so became a whig, sir:
 And thus preferment I procur'd
 From our new faith's defender;
 And almost ev'ry day abjur'd
 The pope and the pretender.
 And this is law, &c.

Th' illustrious house of Hanover,
 And protestant succession;
 To these I do allegiance swear—
 While they can keep possession:
 For in my faith and loyalty
 I never more will falter,
 And George my lawful king shall be—
 Until the times do alter.
 And this is law I will maintain
 Until my dying day, sir—
 That whatsoever king shall reign,
 I'll be the vicar of Bray, sir.

§ 58. Song. The Storm. G. A. STEVENS.

CEASE, rude Boreas, blustering railer;
 List, ye landsmen, all to me!
 Messmates, hear a brother sailor
 Sing the dangers of the sea;
 From bounding billows fast in motion,
 When the distant whirlwinds rise,
 To the tempest-troubled ocean,
 Where the seas contend with skies!

Hark! the boatswain hoarsely bawling,
 By topsail-sheets and haulyards stand!
 Down top-gallants quick be hauling,
 Down your stay-sails, hand, boys, hand!
 Now it freshens, set the braces,
 The topsail sheets now let go;
 Luff, boys, luff! don't make wry faces,
 Up your topsails nimbly clew.

Now all you on down beds sporting,
 Fondly lock'd in beauty's arms;
 Fresh enjoyments wanton courting,
 Safe from all but love's alarms;
 Round us roars the tempest louder,
 Think what fear our minds enthrals;
 Harder yet, it yet blows harder,
 Now again the boatswain calls!

The top-sail yards point to the wind, boys,
 See all clear to reef each course;
 Let the fore-sheet go, don't mind, boys,
 Though the weather should be worse.
 Fore and aft the sprit-sail yard get,
 Reef the mizen, see all clear;
 Hands up, each preventure-brace set,
 Man the fore-yard, cheer, lads, cheer!

Now the dreadful thunder's roaring,
 Peal on peal contending clash,
 On our heads fierce rain falls pouring.
 In our eyes blue lightnings flash;
 One wide water all around us:
 All above us one black sky;
 Different deaths at once surround us:
 Hark! what means that dreadful cry?

The foremast's gone, cries ev'ry tongue out,
 O'er the lee, twelve feet 'bove deck;
 A leak beneath the chest-tree's sprung out,
 Call all hands to clear the wreck.
 Quick the lanyards cut to pieces;
 Come, my hearts, be stout and bold;
 Plumb the well—the leak increases,
 Four feet water in the hold.

While o'er the ship wild waves are beating,
 We for wives or children mourn;
 Alas! from thence there's no retreating!
 Alas! to them there's no return!
 Still the leak is gaining on us!
 Both chain-pumps are chok'd below:
 Heaven have mercy here upon us!
 For only that can save us now.

O'er the lee-beam is the land, boys,
 Let the guns o'erboard be thrown;
 To the pump come ev'ry hand, boys,
 See! our mizen-mast is gone!

The leak we've found, it cannot pour fast,
 We've lighten'd her a foot or more ;
 Up, and rig a jury foremast,
 She rights, she rights, boys, we're off shore!
 Now once more on joys we're thinking,
 Since kind Heaven has sav'd our lives !
 Come, the can, boys ! let's be drinking
 To our sweethearts and our wives ;
 Fill it up, about ship wheel it,
 Close to our lips a brimmer join :
 Where's the tempest now, who feels it ?
 None—the danger's drown'd in wine.

§ 59. Song. Neptune's raging Fury ; or the gallant Seaman's Sufferings.

You gentlemen of England
 That live at home at ease,
 Ah, little do you think upon
 The dangers of the seas ;
 Give ear unto the mariners,
 And they will plainly show
 [All] the cares, and the fears,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

All you that will be seamen,
 Must bear a valiant heart,
 For when you come upon the seas
 You must not think to start ;
 Nor once to be faint-hearted,
 In hail, rain, blow, or snow,
 Nor to think for to shrink
 When the stormy winds do blow.

The bitter storms and tempests
 Poor seamen do endure,
 Both day and night, with many a fright,
 We seldom rest secure ;
 Our sleep it is disturbed
 With visions strange to know,
 And with dreams on the streams,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

In claps of roaring thunder,
 Which darkness doth enforce,
 We often find our ship to stray
 Beyond her wonted course :
 Which causeth great distractions,
 And sinks our hearts full low ;
 'Tis in vain to complain,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

Sometimes in Neptune's bosom
 Our ship is tost in waves,
 And ev'ry man expecting
 The sea to be their graves !
 Then up aloft she mounteth,
 And down again so low,
 'Tis with waves, O with waves,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

Then down again we fall to pray'r,
 With all our might and thought,
 When refuge all doth fail us,
 'Tis that must bear us out ;
 To God we call for succour,
 For he it is, we know,
 That must aid us, and save us,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

The lawyer and the usurer,
 That sit in gowns of fur,
 In closets warm, can take no harm,
 Abroad they need not stir ;
 When winter fierce with cold doth pierce,
 And beats with hail and snow,
 We are sure to endure,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

We bring home costly merchandise,
 And jewels of great price,
 To serve our English gallantry,
 With many a rare device ;
 To please our English gallantry,
 Our pains we freely show,
 For we toil and we moil,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

We sometimes sail to th' Indies,
 To fetch home spices rare ;
 Sometimes again, to France and Spain,
 For wines beyond compare ;
 Whilst gallants are carousing,
 In taverns on a row,
 Then we sweep o'er the deep,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

When tempests are blown over,
 And greatest fears are past,
 In weather fair, and temp'rate air,
 We straight lie down to rest ;
 But when the billows tumble,
 And waves do furious grow,
 Then we rouse, up we rouse,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

If enemies oppose us,
 When England is at war
 With any foreign nations,
 We fear not wound nor scar ;
 Our roaring guns shall teach 'em
 Our valor for to know,
 Whilst they reel, in the keel,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

We are no cowardly shrinkers,
 But true Englishmen bred,
 We'll ply our parts, like valiant hearts,
 And never fly for dread ;
 We'll play our business nimbly
 Whene'er we come or go,
 With our mates, to the Straits,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

Then courage, all brave mariners,
 And never be dismay'd,
 Whilst we have bold adventurers
 We ne'er shall want a trade ;
 Our merchants will employ us,
 To fetch them wealth, I know ;
 Then be bold, work for gold,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

When we return in safety,
 With wages for our pains,
 The tapster and the vintner
 Will help to share our gains :
 We call for liquor roundly,
 And pay before we go :
 Then we'll roar on the shore,
 When the stormy winds do blow.

§ 60. Song. GOLDSMITH.

THE wretch condemn'd with life to part
 Still, still on hope relies;
 And ev'ry pang that rends the heart,
 Bids expectation rise.
 Hope, like the glimmering taper's light,
 Adorns and cheers the way;
 And still, as darker grows the night,
 Emits a brighter ray.

§ 61. Song. GOLDSMITH.

O MEMORY! thou fond deceiver,
 Still importunate and vain,
 To former joys recurring ever,
 And turning all the past to pain:
 Thou, like the world, th' oppress'd oppressing,
 Thy smiles increase the wretch's woe!
 And he who wants each other blessing,
 In thee must ever find a foe.

§ 62. Song.

GENTLY touch the warbling lyre,
 Chloe seems inclin'd to rest;
 Fill her soul with fond desire,
 Softest notes will soothe her breast:
 Pleasing dreams assist in love:
 Let them all propitious prove.
 On the mossy bank she lies
 (Nature's verdant velvet bed),
 Beauteous flowers meet her eyes,
 Forming pillows for her head;
 Zephyrs waft their odours round,
 And indulging whispers sound.

§ 63. The same parodied.

GENTLY stir and blow the fire,
 Lay the mutton down to roast,
 Dress it quickly, I desire,
 In the dripping put a toast,
 That I hunger may remove;
 Mutton is the meat I love.
 On the dresser see it lie,
 O! the charming white and red!
 Finer meat ne'er met my eye.
 On the sweetest grass it fed:
 Let the jack go swiftly round,
 Let me have it nicely brown'd.
 On the table spread the cloth,
 Let the knives be sharp and clean:
 Pickles get, and salad both;
 Let them each be fresh and green:
 With small beer, good ale, and wine,
 O ye Gods! how I shall dine!

§ 64. Song. SHAKSPEARE.

UNDER the green-wood tree,
 Who loves to lie with me,
 And tune his merry note
 Unto the sweet bird's throat,

Come hither, come hither, come hither;
 Here shall he see
 No enemy,
 But winter and rough weather.
 Who doth ambition shun,
 And loves to lie i' th' sun,
 Seeking the food he eats,
 And pleas'd with what he gets,
 Come hither, come hither, come hither;
 Here shall he see
 No enemy,
 But winter and rough weather.

§ 65. A Dirge. D'URFEY.

SLEEP, sleep, poor youth! sleep, sleep in peace,
 Reliev'd from love, and mortal care;
 Whilst we, that pine in life's disease,
 Uncertain blest less happy are.
 Couch'd in the dark and silent grave,
 No ills of fate thou now canst fear;
 In vain would tyrant power enslave,
 Or scornful beauty be severe.
 Wars that do fatal storms disperse,
 Far from thy happy mansion keep:
 Earthquakes that shake the universe,
 Can't rock thee into sounder sleep.
 With all the charms of peace possess,
 Secure from life's tormentor, pain,
 Sleep, and indulge thyself with rest,
 Nor dream thou ere shalt rise again.

CHORUS.

Past is the fear of future doubt,
 The sun is from the dial gone,
 The sands are sunk, the glass is out,
 The folly of the farce is done!

§ 66. Song. GARRICK.

THOU soft flowing Avon, by thy silver stream
 Of things more than mortal sweet Shakspeare would dream,
 The fairies by moon-light dance round his green
 bed,
 For hallow'd the turf is which pillow'd his
 head.
 The love-stricken maiden, the soft-sighing swain, <sup>(pain:</sup>
 Here rove without danger, and sigh without
 The sweet bud of beauty no blight shall here
 dread,
 For hallow'd the turf is which pillow'd his head.
 Here youth shall be fam'd for their love and their truth,
 And cheerful old age feel the spirit of youth;
 For the raptures of fancy here poets shall tread,
 For hallow'd the turf is that pillow'd his head.
 Flow on, silver Avon, in song ever flow!
 Be the swans on thy borders still whiter than snow!
 Ever full be thy stream, like his fame may it
 spread!
 And the turf ever hallow'd which pillow'd his
 head.

§ 67. Song. The Fairies.

COME follow, follow me,
Ye fairy elves that be,
Light tripping o'er the green;
Come follow Mab, your queen:
Hand in hand we'll dance around,
For this place is fairy ground.

When mortals are at rest,
And snoring in their nest;
Unheard and unespied,
Through key-holes we do glide;
Over tables, stools, and shelves,
We trip it with our fairy elves.

And if the house be foul
With platter, dish, or bowl,
Up stairs we nimbly creep,
And find the sluts asleep;
Then we pinch their arms and thighs;
None us hears, and none us spies.

But if the house be swept,
And from uncleanness kept,
We praise the household maid,
And duly she is paid:
Every night before we go,
We drop a tester in her shoe.

'Then o'er a mushroom's head
Our table-cloth we spread;
A grain of rye or wheat,
The diet that we eat;
Pearly drops of dew we drink,
In acorn cups fill'd to the brink.

The brains of nightingales,
With unctuous fat of snails,
Between two cockles stew'd,
Is meat that's easily chew'd;
Tails of worms, and marrow of mice,
Do make a dish that's wondrous nice!

The grasshopper, gnat, and fly,
Serve for our minstrelsy;
Grace said, we dance a while,
And so the time beguile:
And if the moon doth hide her head,
The glow-worm lights us home to bed.

O'er tops of dewy grass
So nimbly we do pass,
The young and tender stalk
Ne'er bends where we do walk;
Yet in the morning may be seen—
Where we the night before have been.

§ 68. Song. The Thief and Cordelier. PRIOR.

WHO has e'er been at Paris must needs know
the Grève,
The fatal retreat of th' unfortunate brave;
Where honor and justice most oddly contribute
To ease heroes' pains by a halter and gibbet.
Derry down, down, hey derry down.

There death breaks the shackles which force had put on,
And the hangman completes what the judge
had begun:

There the squire of the pad, and the knight of the post,
Find their pains no more balk'd, and their hopes no more cross'd.
Derry down, &c.

Great claims are there made, and great secrets
are known;
And the king, and the law, and the thief, has
his own;
But my hearers cry out, What a deuce dost
thou ail?
Put off thy reflections, and give us thy tale.
Derry down, &c.

'Twas there then, in civil respect to harsh laws,
And for want of false witness to back a bad
cause,
A Norman, though late, was obliged to appear;
And who to assist but a grave Cordelier!
Derry down, &c.

The squire whose good grace was to open the scene,
Seem'd not in great haste that the show should begin;
Now fitted the halter, now travers'd the cart,
And often took leave, but was loth to depart.
Derry down, &c.

What frightens you thus, my good son? says
the priest;
You murder'd, are sorry, and have been con-
fess'd.
O father! my sorrow will scarce save my bacon;
For 'twas not that I murder'd, but that I was taken.
Derry down, &c.

Pooh! pry'thee, ne'er trouble thy head with such fancies;
Rely on the aid you shall have from St. Francis:
If the money you promised be brought to the chest,
You have only to die; let the church do the rest.
Derry down, &c.

And what will folks say if they see you afraid?
It reflects upon me, as I knew not my trade:
Courage, friend! to-day is your period of sorrow:
And things will go better, believe me, tomorrow.
Derry down, &c.

To-morrow? our hero replied in a fright;
He that's hang'd before noon ought to think of to-night.
Tell your beads, says the priest, and be fairly
truss'd up;
For you surely to-night shall in Paradise sup.
Derry down, &c.

Alas! quoth the squire, howe'er sumptuous
the treat,
Parbleu! I shall have little stomach to eat:
I should therefore esteem it great favor and grace,
Would you be so kind as to go in my place.
Derry down, &c.

That I would, quoth the father, and thank you to boot;
But our actions, you know, with our duty
must suit:

The feast I propos'd to you, I cannot taste ;
For this night, by our order, is mark'd for a fast.
Derry down, &c.

Then turning about to the hangman, he said :
Dispatch me, I pray thee, this troublesome
blade ;

For thy cord and my cord both equally tie ;
And we live by the gold for which other men die.

Derry down, down, hey derry down.

§ 69. Song. Admiral Hosier's Ghost.

GLOVER.

It was written by the ingenious author of Leonidas, on the taking of Porto-Bello from the Spaniards by Admiral Vernon, Nov. 22, 1739.—The case of Hosier, which is here so pathetically represented, was briefly this: In April, 1726, that commander was sent with a strong fleet to the West Indies, to block up the galleons in the ports of that country ; or, should they presume to come out, to seize and carry them to England : he accordingly arrived at the Bastimentos, near Porto-Bello, but being restricted by his orders from obeying the dictates of his courage, lay inactive on that station until he became the jest of the Spaniards : he afterwards removed to Cartagena, and continued cruising in these seas till the far greater part of his men perished deplorably by the diseases of that unhealthy climate.—This brave man, seeing his best officers and men thus daily swept away, his ships exposed to inevitable destruction, and himself made the sport of the enemy, is said to have died of a broken heart.

As near Porto-Bello lying
On the gently-swelling flood,
At midnight with streamers flying,
Our triumphant navy rode ;
There, while Vernon sate all-glorious
From the Spaniards' late defeat,
And his crews, with shouts victorious,
Drank success to England's fleet ;

On a sudden, shrilly sounding,
Hideous yells and shrieks were heard :
Then, each heart with fear confounding,
A sad troop of ghosts appear'd ;
All in dreary hammocks shrouded,
Which for winding-sheets they wore,
And, with looks by sorrow clouded,
Frowning on that hostile shore.

On them gleam'd the moon's wan lustre ;
When the shade of Hosier brave
His pale bands were seen to muster,
Rising from their wat'ry grave :
O'er the glimmering wave he hied him,
Where the Burford rear'd her sail,
With three thousand ghosts beside him,
And in groans did Vernon hail.

Heed, O heed, our fatal story !
I am Hosier's injur'd ghost ;
You, who now have purchas'd glory
At this place where I was lost :
Though in Porto-Bello's ruin
You now triumph free from fears ;
When you think of my undoing,
You will mix your joys with tears.

See these mournful spectres sweeping
Ghastly o'er this hated wave,
Whose wan cheeks are stain'd with weeping :
These were English captains brave.
Mark those numbers, pale and horrid,
Who were once my sailors bold ;
Lo ! each hangs his drooping forehead,
While his dismal tale is told.

I, by twenty sail attended,
Did the Spanish town affright ;
Nothing then its wealth defended,
But my orders not to fight.
O ! that in this rolling ocean
I had cast them with disdain ;
And obey'd my heart's warm motion
To have quell'd the pride of Spain !

For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achiev'd with six alone.
Then the Bastimentos never
Had our foul dishonor seen,
Nor the sea the sad receiver
Of this gallant train had been.

Thus like thee, proud Spain dismaying,
And her galleons leading home,
Though, condemn'd for disobeying,
I had met a traitor's doom :
To have fallen, my country crying,
" He has play'd an English part,"
Had been better far than dying
Of a griev'd and broken heart.

Unrepining at thy glory,
Thy successful arms we hail ;
But remember our sad story,
And let Hosier's wrongs prevail.
Sent in this foul clime to languish,
Think what thousands fell in vain,
Wasted with disease and anguish,
Not in glorious battle slain.

Hence, with all my train attending
From their oozy tombs below,
Through the hoary foam ascending,
Here I feel my constant woe :
Here, the Bastimentos viewing,
We recall our shameful doom,
And, our plaintive cries renewing,
Wander through the midnight gloom.

O'er the waves, for ever mourning,
Shall we roam depriv'd of rest,
If, to Britain's shores returning,
You neglect my just request :
After this proud foe subduing,
When your patriot friends you see,
Think on vengeance for my ruin,
And for England—sham'd in me.

§ 70. *Song. Captain Death*.*

THE muse and the hero together are fir'd,
The same noble views have their bosoms in-
spir'd ;

* Written, as it is said, by one of his surviving crew.

As freedom they love, and for glory contend,
The muse o'er the hero still mourns as a friend:
And here let the muse her poor tribute bequeath
To one British hero—'tis brave captain Death!
His ship was the Terrible—dreadful to see!
His crew was as brave and as gallant as he;
Two hundred or more was their good comple-
ment,

And sure braver fellows to sea never went:
Each man was determin'd to spend his last breath
In fighting for Britain and brave captain Death.
A prize they had taken diminish'd their force,
And soon the good prize-ship was lost in her
course:

The French privateer* and the Terrible met:—
The battle begun—all with horror beset!
No heart was dismay'd, each as bold as Macbeth;

They fought for old England, and brave captain Death.

Fire, thunder, balls, bullets, were seen, heard,
and felt;

A sight that the heart of Bellona would melt!
The shrouds were all torn, and the decks fill'd with blood, [flood:

And scores of dead bodies were thrown in the
The flood, from the days of old Noah and Seth,
Ne'er saw such a man as our brave captain Death.
At last the dread bullet came wing'd with his fate, [mate;

Our brave captain dropp'd, and soon after his
Each officer fell, and a carnage was seen,
That soon dyed the waves to a crimson from green: [wreath,

And Neptune rose up, and he took off his
And gave it a Triton to crown captain Death.
Thus fell the strong Terrible bravely and bold;
But sixteen survivors the tale can unfold!

The French were the victors, though much to their cost, [lost.

For many brave French were with Englishmen
And thus says old Time, "From good queen Elizabeth,

I ne'er saw the fellow of brave captain Death."

§ 71. Song. The Sea Fight in xcii†.

THURSDAY in the morn, the ides of May,
Recorded for ever the famous ninety-two,
Brave Russel did discern, by dawn of day,
The lofty sails of France advancing now;

* Called the Vengeance.

† The great naval victory, intended to be celebrated by this excellent old song, was determined, after a running action of several days, off Cape La Hogue, on the coast of Normandy, the 22d of May, 1692, in favor of the English and Dutch combined fleets, consisting of 99 sail of the line, under the command of Admiral Russel, afterwards Earl of Orford, over a French squadron of about half that number, commanded by the Chevalier Tourville, whose ship Le Soleil Royal carried upwards of a hundred guns, and was esteemed the finest vessel in Europe. This last fleet was fitted out for the purpose of restoring King James the Second to his dominions; and that prince, together with the Duke of Berwick, and several great officers both of his own court and of the court of France, and even Tourville himself, beheld the final destruction of the French ships from an eminence on the shore. It is now certain that Russel had engaged to favor the scheme of his old master's restoration, on condition that the French took care to avoid him; but Tourville's impetuosity and rashness rendered the whole measure abortive: and the distressed and ill-fated monarch retired in a fit of despondency, to mourn his misfortunes, and recover his peace of mind, amid the solitary gloom of La Trappe.

‡ This song was written in compliment to Mrs. Woffington.

All hands aloft, aloft, let English valor shine,
Let fly a culverin, the signal for the line;

Let every hand supply his gun;

Follow me,

And you'll see

That the battle will be soon begun.

Tourville on the main triumphant roll'd,

To meet the gallant Russel in combat on the deep;

He led a noble train of heroes bold,

To sink the English admiral and his fleet.

Now every valiant mind to victory doth aspire,

The bloody fight's begun, the sea itself on fire:

And mighty Fate stood looking on;

Whilst a flood,

All of blood,

Fill'd the scuppers of the Royal Sun!

Sulphur, smoke, and fire, disturbing the air,

With thunder and wonder affright the Gallic
shore;

Their regulated bands stood trembling near,

To see the lofty streamers now no more.

At six o'clock the Red the smiling victors led,

To give a second blow, the fatal overthrow;

Now death and horror equal reign;

Now they cry,

Run or die,

British colors ride the vanquish'd main!

See, they fly amaz'd o'er rocks and sands! [fate;

One danger they grasp at to shun the greater

In vain they cry for aid to weeping lands;

The nymphs and sea-gods mourn their lost estate!

For evermore adieu, thou Royal dazzling Sun,

From thy untimely end thy master's fate begun:

Enough, thou mighty god of war!

Now we sing,

Bless the king,

Let us drink to every English tar.

§ 72. Song. Peggy†. GARRICK.

ONCE more I'll tune the vocal shell,

To hills and dales my passion tell,

A flame which time can never quell,

That burns for thee, my Peggy:

Yet greater bards the lyre should hit;

For pray what subject is more fit,

Than to record the sparkling wit

And bloom of lovely Peggy?

The sun first rising in the morn,
That paints the dew-bespangled thorn,
Does not so much the day adorn,

As does my lovely Peggy :
And when in Thetis' lap to rest,
He streaks with gold the ruddy west,
He's not so beauteous as undress'd

Appears my lovely Peggy.
When Zephyr on the violet blows,
Or breathes upon the damask rose,
He does not half the sweets disclose

That does my lovely Peggy.
I stole a kiss the other day,
And, trust me, nought but truth I say,
The fragrance of the blooming May

Is not so sweet as Peggy.
Were she array'd in rustic weed,
With her the bleating flocks I'd feed,
And pipe upon the oaten reed,

To please my lovely Peggy :
With her a cottage would delight,
All's happy when she's in my sight ;
But when she's gone it's endless night—

All's dark without my Peggy.
While bees from flow'r to flow'r shall rove,
And linnets warble through the grove,
Or stately swans the rivers love,

So long shall I love Peggy :
And when death with his pointed dart
Shall strike the blow that rives my heart,
My words shall be, when I depart,

“ Adieu, my lovely Peggy !”

§ 73. Song. The Miller's Wedding. GARRICK.

LEAVE, neighbours, your work, and to sport
and to play ;

Let the tabor strike up, and the village be gay :
No day through the year shall more cheerful be
seen ;

For Ralph of the Mill marries Sue of the Green.

CHORUS.

I love Sue, and Sue loves me,
And while the wind blows,
And while the mill goes,
Who'll be so happy, so happy as we ?

Let lords and fine folks, who for wealth take a bride,

Be married to-day, and to-morrow be cloy'd :
My body is stout, and my heart is as sound ;
And my love, like my courage, will never give
ground.

Chorus——I love Sue, &c.

Let ladies of fashion the best jointures wed,
And prudently take the best bidders to bed :
Such signing and sealing's no part of our bliss ;
We settle our hearts, and we seal with a kiss.

Chorus——I love Sue, &c.

Though Ralph is not courtly, nor none of your
beaux,

Nor bounces, nor flatters, nor wears your fine
clothes,

In nothing he'll follow the folks of high life,
Nor e'er turn his back on his friend or his wife.

Chorus——I love Sue, &c.

While thus I am able to work at my mill, While thus thou art kind, and thy tongue but lies still,

Our joys shall continue and ever be new,
And none be so happy as Ralph and his Sue.

Chorus——I love Sue, &c.

§ 74. Sung in the Winter's Tale. GARRICK.

COME, come, my good shepherds, our flocks
we must shear ;

In your holiday-suits with your lasses appear :
The happiest of folk are the guileless and free ;
And who are so guileless, so happy, as we ?

We harbor no passions by luxury taught,
We practise no arts with hypocrisy fraught ;
What we think in our hearts you may read in our eyes ;

For, knowing no falsehood, we need no disguise.

By mode and caprice are the city dames led,
But we as the children of Nature are bred ;
By her hand alone we are painted and dress'd ;
For the roses will bloom when there's peace in the breast.

That giant, ambition, we never can dread ;
Our roofs are too low for so lofty a head :
Content and sweet cheerfulness open our door,
They smile with the simple, and feed with the poor.

When love has possess'd us, that love we reveal ;
Like the flocks that we feed are the passions we feel ;

So harmless and simple we sport and we play,
And leave to fine folks to deceive and betray.

§ 75. Song. GARRICK.

YE fair married dames, who so often deplore
That a lover once blest is a lover no more ;
Attend to my counsel, nor blush to be taught
That prudence must cherish what beauty has caught.

The bloom of your cheek, and the glance of your eye,

Your roses and lilies, may make the men sigh ;
But roses, and lilies, and sighs pass away,
And passion will die as your beauties decay.

Use the man that you wed like your favorite guitar,

Though music's in both, they are both apt to jar ;
How tuneful and soft from a delicate touch,
Not handled too roughly, nor play'd on too
much !

The sparrow and linnet will feed from your hand,

Grow tame at your kindness, and come at command :

Exert with your husband the same happy skill,
For hearts, like young birds, may be tam'd to your will.

Be gay and good-humor'd, complying and kind,
Turn the chief of your care from your face to your mind ;

'Tis thus that a wife may her conquest improve,
And Hymen shall rivet the fetters of Love.

§ 76. Song in Harlequin's Invasion. GARRICK.

To arms! ye brave mortals, to arms:
The road to renown lies before ye!
The name of King Shakspeare has charms
To rouse you to actions of glory.

Away! ye brave mortals, away!
'Tis Nature calls on you to save her;
What man but would Nature obey,
And fight for her Shakspeare for ever!

§ 77. Song in the same. GARRICK.

THRICE happy the nation that Shakspeare has charm'd!

More happy the bosoms his genius has warm'd!
Ye children of nature, of fashion, and whim,
He painted you all, all join to praise him.

Chorus. Come away! come away!
His genius calls—you must obey.

From highest to lowest, from old to the young,
All states and conditions by him have been sung;
All passions and humors were rais'd by his pen;
He could soar with the eagle, and sink with the wren.

Chorus. Come away, &c.

To praise him ye Fairies and Genii repair,
He knew where ye haunted, in earth or in air:
No phantom so subtle could glide from his view,
The wings of his fancy were swifter than you.

Chorus. Come away! come away!
His genius calls—you must obey.

§ 78. Song in the Country Girl. GARRICK.

TELL not me of the roses and lilies
Which tinge the fair cheek of your Phyllis;
Tell not me of the dimples and eyes
For which silly Corydon dies:

Let all whining lovers go hang;
My heart would you hit,
Tip your arrow with wit,
And it comes to my heart with a twang, twang,
And it comes to my heart with a twang.

I am rock to the handsome and pretty,
Can only be touch'd by the witty;
And beauty will ogle in vain:
The way to my heart's through my brain.
Let all whining lovers go hang:
We wits, you must know,
Have two strings to our bow,
To return them their darts with a twang, twang,
To return them their darts with a twang.

§ 79. Air in Cymon. GARRICK.

You gave me last week a young linnet,
Shut up in a fine golden cage;
Yet how sad the poor thing was within it,
O how it did flutter and rage!
Then he mop'd and he pin'd,
That his wings were confin'd,
Till I open'd the door of his den:
Then so merry was he;
And, because he was free,
He came to his cage back again.

§ 80. Air in Cymon. GARRICK.

YET a while, sweet sleep, deceive me,
Fold me in thy downy arms;
Let not care awake to grieve me,
Lull it with thy potent charms.

I, a turtle doom'd to stray,
Quitting young the parent's nest,
Find each bird a bird of prey;
Sorrow knows not where to rest!

§ 81. Shakspeare's Mulberry Tree. GARRICK.

BEHOLD this fair goblet! 'twas carv'd from the tree,

Which, O my sweet Shakspeare, was planted
by thee!

As a relic I kiss it, and bow at thy shrine,
What comes from thy hand must be ever divine!

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree;

Bend to thee,

Blest Mulberry!

Matchless was he

Who planted thee,

And thou like him immortal shalt be.

Ye trees of the forest, so rampant and high,
Who spread round your branches, whose heads
sweep the sky;

Ye curious exotics, whom taste has brought
To root out the natives at prices so dear; [here
All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

The oak is held royal, is Britain's great boast, Preserv'd once our king, and will always our coast; [that fight,

But of fir we make ships, we have thousands While one, only one, like our Shakspeare can write.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

Let Venus delight in her gay myrtle bowers,
Pomona in fruit-trees, and Flora in flowers;
The garden of Shakspeare all fancies will suit,
With the sweetest of flowers, and fairest of fruit.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

With learning and knowledge the well-letter'd
birch [church;

Supplies law and physic, and grace for the
But law and the gospel in Shakspeare we find,
And he gives the best physic for body and mind.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

The fame of the patron gives fame to the tree,
From him and his merits this takes its degree;
Let Phœbus and Bacchus their glories resign,
Our tree shall surpass both the laurel and vine.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

The genius of Shakspeare outshines the bright
day,

More rapture than wine to the heart can convey;
So the tree that he planted, by making his own,
Has laurel, and bays, and the vine, all in one.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree, &c.

Then each take a relic of this hallow'd tree;
From folly and fashion a charm let it be:
Fill, fill to the planter the cup to the brim;
To honor the country, do honor to him.

All shall yield to the Mulberry-tree ;
 Bend to thee,
 Blest Mulberry !
 Matchless was he
 Who planted thee,
 And thou, like him, immortal shalt be.

§ 82. The Friar of Orders Grey.

“ Dispersed through Shakspeare’s plays are innumerable little fragments of ancient ballads, the entire copies of which could not be recovered. Many of these being of the most beautiful and pathetic simplicity, the Editor was tempted to select some of them, and with a few supplemental stanzas to connect them together, and form them into a little tale. One small fragment was taken from Beaumont and Fletcher.”

It was a friar of orders grey
 Walk’d forth to tell his beads ;
 And he met with a lady fair,
 Clad in a pilgrim’s weeds.

Now Christ thee save, thou reverend friar,
 I pray thee tell to me,
 If ever, at yon holy shrine,
 My true-love thou didst see.

And how should I know your true-love
 From many another one ?—
 O, by his cockle hat and staff,
 And by his sandal shoon :

But chiefly by his face and mien,
 That were so fair to view ;
 His flaxen locks, that sweetly curl’d,
 And eyne of lovely blue.

O lady, he is dead and gone !
 Lady, he’s dead and gone !
 And at his head a green-grass turf,
 And at his heels a stone.

Within these holy cloisters long
 He languish’d, and he died,
 Lamenting of a lady’s love,
 And ’plaining of her pride.

Here bore him, bare-faced on his bier,
 Six proper youths and tall ;
 And many a tear bedew’d his grave
 Within yon kirk-yard wall.

And art thou dead, thou gentle youth ?
 And art thou dead and gone ?
 And didst thou die for love of me ?
 Break, cruel heart of stone !

O weep not, lady, weep not so !
 Some ghostly comfort seek :
 Let not vain sorrow rive thy heart,
 Nor tears bedew thy cheek.

O do not, do not, holy friar,
 My sorrow now reprove ;
 For I have lost the sweetest youth
 That e’er won lady’s love.

And now, alas ! for thy sad loss,
 I’ll ever weep and sigh ;
 For thee I only wish to live,
 For thee I wish to die.

Weep no more, lady, weep no more,
 Thy sorrow is in vain :
 For violets pluck’d, the sweetest show’rs
 Will ne’er make grow again.

Our joys as winged dreams do fly,
 Why then should sorrow last ?
 Since grief but aggravates thy loss,
 Grieve not for what is past.

O say not so, thou holy friar !
 I pray thee, say not so !
 For since my true-love died for me,
 ’Tis meet my tears should flow.

And will he never come again ?
 Will he ne’er come again ?
 Ah, no ! he is dead, and laid in his grave,
 For ever to remain.

His cheek was redder than the rose,
 The comeliest youth was he.
 But he is dead, and laid in his grave,
 Alas ! and woe is me !

Sigh no more, lady, sigh no more,
 Men were deceivers ever ;
 One foot on sea, and one on land,
 To one thing constant never.

Hadst thou been fond, he had been false,
 And left thee sad and heavy ;
 For young men ever were fickle found,
 Since summer-trees were leafy.

Now say not so, thou holy friar,
 I pray thee, say not so !
 My love he had the truest heart ;
 O he was ever true !

And art thou dead, thou much-lov’d youth ?
 And didst thou die for me ?
 Then farewell, home ! for evermore
 A pilgrim I will be.

But first upon my true-love’s grave
 My weary limbs I’ll lay ;
 And thrice I’ll kiss the green-grass turf
 That wraps his breathless clay.

Yet stay, fair lady, stay a while
 Beneath this cloister wall :
 See, through the hawthorn blows the wind,
 And drizzly rain doth fall.

O stay me not, thou holy friar,
 O stay me not, I pray !
 No drizzly rain that falls on me
 Can wash my fault away.

Yet stay, fair lady, turn again,
 And dry those pearly tears ;
 For see, beneath this gown of grey,
 Thy own true-love appears.

Here, forced by grief and hopeless love,
 These holy weeds I sought :
 And here, amidst these lonely walls,
 To end my days I thought.

But haply, for my year of grace
 Is not yet pass’d away,
 Might I still hope to win thy love,
 No longer would I stay.

Now farewell grief, and welcome joy
Once more unto my heart;
For since I've found thee, lovely youth,
We never more will part.

§ 83. Song. Black-eyed Susan. GAY.

ALL in the Downs the fleet was moor'd,
The streamers waving in the wind,
When black-ey'd Susan came on board,
O where shall I my true-love find?
Tell me, ye jovial sailors, tell me true,
If my sweet William sails among your crew.
William, who high upon the yard
Rock'd by the billows to and fro,
Soon as her well-known voice he heard,
He sigh'd, and cast his eyes below;
The cord glides swiftly through his glowing
hands,
And quick as lightning on the deck he stands.
So the sweet lark, high-pois'd in air,
Shuts close his pinions to his breast,
If chance his mate's shrill call he hear,
And drops at once into her nest.
The noblest captain in the British fleet
Might envy William's lips those kisses sweet.
O Susan, Susan, lovely dear!
My vows shall ever true remain;
Let me kiss off that falling tear:
We only part to meet again.
Change as ye list, ye winds, my heart shall be
The faithful compass that still points to thee.
Believe not what the landmen say,
Who tempt with doubts thy constant mind:
They'll tell thee, sailors, when away,
At every port a mistress find.
Yes, yes, believe them when they tell thee so,
For thou art present wheresoe'er I go.

If to fair India's coast we sail,
Thy eyes are seen in diamonds bright;
Thy breath is Afric's spicy gale,
Thy skin is ivory so white.
Thus every beauteous object that I view
Wakes in my soul some charm of lovely Sue.
Though battle calls me from thy arms,
Let not my pretty Susan mourn;
Though cannons roar, yet free from harms,
William shall to his dear return:
Love turns aside the balls that round me fly,
Lest precious tears should drop from Susan's eye.
The boatswain gives the dreadful word,
The sails their swelling bosoms spread;
No longer must she stay on board:
They kiss'd; she sigh'd; he hung his head;
Her less'ning boat unwilling rows to land;
Adieu! she cries, and wav'd her lily hand.

§ 84. Song. ROWE.

As on a summer's day,
In the greenwood shade I lay,
The maid that I lov'd,
As her fancy mov'd,
Came walking forth that way.

And as she passed by,
With a scornful glance of her eye,
What a shame, quoth she,
For a swain must it be,
Like a lazy loon for to lie!
And dost thou nothing heed
What Pan our god has decreed,
What a prize to-day
Shall be given away
To the sweetest shepherd's reed?
There's not a single swain
Of all this fruitful plain,
But with hopes and fears
Now busily prepares
The bonny boon to gain.
Shall another maiden shine
In brighter array than thine?
Up, up, dull swain,
Tune thy pipe once again,
And make the garland mine.
Alas! my love, I cried,
What avails this courtly pride?
Since thy dear desert
Is written in my heart,
What is all the world beside?
To me thou art more gay,
In this homely russet grey,
Than the nymphs of our green,
So trim and so sheen,
Or the brightest queen of May.
What though my fortune frown,
And deny thee a silken gown;
My own dear maid,
Be content with this shade,
And a shepherd all thy own.

§ 85. Song. PRIOR.

ALEXIS shunn'd his fellow-swains,
Their rural sports and jocund strains:
Heaven shield us all from Cupid's bow!
He lost his crook, he left his flocks,
And, wand'ring through the lonely rocks,
He nourish'd endless woe.
The nymphs and shepherds round him came,
His grief some pity, others blame,
The fatal cause all kindly seek;
He mingled his concern with theirs,
He gave them back their friendly tears,
He sigh'd, but could not speak.
Clarinda came, among the rest;
And she, too, kind concern express'd,
And ask'd the reason of his woe;
She ask'd, but with an air and mien
That made it easily foreseen
She fear'd too much to know.
The shepherd rais'd his mournful head:
And will you pardon me, he said,
While I the cruel truth reveal;
Which nothing from my breast should tear,
Which never should offend your ear,
But that you bid me tell?

'Tis thus I rove, 'tis thus complain,
 Since you appear'd upon the plain;
 You are the cause of all my care:
 Your eyes ten thousand daggers dart,
 Ten thousand torments vex my heart,
 I love, and I despair.

Too much, Alexis, have I heard;
 'Tis what I thought, 'tis what I fear'd,
 And yet I pardon you, she cried;
 But you shall promise, ne'er again
 To breathe your vows, or speak your pain:
 He bow'd, obey'd—and died.

§ 86. Song.

ONE morning very early, one morning in the spring,
 I heard a maid in Bedlam, who mournfully did
 sing;
 Her chains she rattled on her hands, while sweetly thus sung she, [me.
 I love my love, because I know my love loves
 O cruel were his parents who sent my love to sea,
 And cruel, cruel was the ship that bore my love
 from me!
 Yet I love his parents, since they're his, altho'
 they've ruin'd me,
 And I love my love, because I know my love
 loves me.
 O! should it please the pitying pow'rs to call me to the sky,
 I'd claim a guardian angel's charge, around my love to fly;
 To guard him from all dangers, how happy should I be!
 For I love my love, because I know my love
 loves me.

I'll make a strawy garland, I'll make it wondrous fine,
 With roses, lilies, daisies, I'll mix the eglantine,
 And I'll present it to my love, when he returns
 from sea;
 For I love my love, because I know my love
 loves me.

O if I were a little bird to build upon his breast, [rest!
 Or if I were a nightingale to sing my love to
 To gaze upon his lovely eyes all my reward should be!
 For I love my love, because I know my love
 loves me.

O, if I were an eagle, to soar into the sky!
 I'd gaze around with piercing eyes where I my love might spy:
 But ah, unhappy maiden! that love you ne'er shall see:
 Yet I love my love, because I know my love loves me.

§ 87. Song.

THE sun was sunk beneath the hill,
 The western clouds were lin'd with gold;
 Clear was the sky, the wind was still,
 The flocks were penn'd within the fold;

When in the silence of the grove
 Poor Damon thus despair'd of love:
 Who seeks to pluck the fragrant rose
 From the hard rock or oozy beach,
 Who from each weed that barren grows
 Expects the grape or downy peach,
 With equal faith may hope to find
 The truth of love in woman-kind.

No herds have I, no fleecy care,
 No fields that wave with golden grain,
 No pastures green, or gardens fair,
 A woman's venal heart to gain;
 Then all in vain my sighs must prove,
 Whose whole estate, alas! is love.

How wretched is the faithful youth,
 Since women's hearts are bought and sold!
 They ask no vows of sacred truth;
 Whene'er they sigh, they sigh for gold:
 Gold can the frowns of scorn remove;
 But I am scorn'd—who have but love.

To buy the gem of India's coast
 What wealth, what riches, would suffice?
 Yet India's shore should never boast
 The lustre of thy rival eyes;
 For there the world too cheap must prove:
 Can I then buy—who have but love?

Then, Mary, since nor gems nor ore
 Can with thy brighter self compare,
 Be just, as fair, and value more
 Than gems or ore a heart sincere:
 Let treasure meaner beauties move;
 Who pays thy worth must pay in love.

§ 88. Song.

WHAT beauties does Flora disclose!
 How sweet are her smiles upon Tweed!
 But Mary's, still sweeter than those,
 Both nature and fancy exceed.
 No daisy, nor sweet blushing rose,
 Nor all the gay flow'rs of the field,
 Nor Tweed gliding gently through those,
 Such beauty and pleasure can yield.

The warblers are heard in each grove,
 The linnet, the lark, and the thrush,
 The blackbird, and sweet cooing dove,
 With music enchant ev'ry bush.
 Come, let us go forth to the mead,
 Let us see how the primroses spring;
 We'll lodge in some village on Tweed,
 And love while the feather'd folks sing.

How does my love pass the long day?
 Does Mary not tend a few sheep?
 Do they never carelessly stray,
 While happily she lies asleep?
 Tweed's murmurs should lull her to rest;
 Kind Nature indulging my bliss,
 To relieve the soft pains of my breast
 I'd steal an ambrosial kiss.

'Tis she does the virgins excel,
 No beauty with her can compare;
 Love's graces all round her do dwell,
 She's fairest where thousands are fair.

Say, charmer, where do thy flocks stray?
O tell me, at noon where they feed!
Shall I seek them on sweet winding Tay,
Or the pleasanter banks of the Tweed?

§ 89. Song. Nancy of the Vale. SHENSTONE.

THE western sky was purpled o'er
With ev'ry pleasing ray,
And flocks, reviving, felt no more
The sultry heat of day;
When from a hazel's artless bow'r
Soft warbled Strephon's tongue;
He bless'd the scene, he bless'd the hour,
While Nancy's praise he sung.
Let fops with fickle falsehood range
The paths of wanton love;
Whilst weeping maids lament their change,
And sadden ev'ry grove:
But endless blessings crown the day
I saw fair Esham's dale;
And every blessing find its way
To Nancy of the Vale.

'Twas from Avon's bank the maid
Diffus'd her lovely beams;
And ev'ry shining glance display'd
The Naiad of the streams.
Soft as the wild-duck's tender young,
That float on Avon's tide,
Bright as the water-lily sprung
And glitt'ring near its side.
Fresh as the bord'ring flow'rs her bloom,
Her eye all mild to view;
The little halcyon's azure plume
Was never half so blue.
Her shape was like the reed, so sleek,
So taper, straight, and fair;
Her dimpled smile, her blushing cheek,
How charming sweet they were!
Far in the winding vale retir'd
This peerless bud I found,
And shadowing rocks and woods conspir'd
To fence her beauties round.
That nature in so lone a dell
Should form a nymph so sweet,
Or fortune to her secret cell
Conduct my wand'ring feet!
Gay lordlings sought her for their bride,
But she would ne'er incline:
Prove to your equals true, she cried,
As I will prove to mine.
'Tis Strephon on the mountain's brow
Has won my right good-will;
To him I give my plighted vow,
With him I'll climb the hill.
Struck with her charms and gentle truth,
I clasp'd the constant fair;
To her alone I give my youth,
And vow my future care.
And when this vow shall faithless prove,
Or I these charms forego,
The stream that saw our tender love,
That stream shall cease to flow.

§ 90. Song. To the Memory of W. Shenstone,
Esq. CUNNINGHAM.

COME, shepherds, we'll follow the hearse,
And see our lov'd Corydon laid:
Though sorrow may blemish the verse,
Yet let the sad tribute be paid.
They call'd him the pride of the plain;
In sooth he was gentle and kind;
He mark'd, in his elegant strain,
The graces that glow'd in his mind.
On purpose he planted yon trees,
That birds in the covert might dwell;
He cultur'd the thyme for the bees,
But never would rifle their cell.
Ye lambkins that play'd at his feet,
Go bleat, and your master bemoan;
His music was artless and sweet,
His manners as mild as your own.
No verdure shall cover the vale,
No bloom on the blossoms appear;
The sweets of the forest shall fail,
And winter discolour the year.
No birds in our hedges shall sing
(Our hedges so vocal before),
Since he that should welcome the spring
Can greet the gay season no more.
His Phyllis was fond of his praise,
And poets came round in a throng;
They listen'd, and envy'd his lays,
But which of them equall'd his song?
Ye shepherds, henceforward be mute,
For lost is the pastoral strain;
So give me my Corydon's flute,
And thus—let me break it in twain.

§ 91. Song. LYTTTELTON.

THE heavy hours are almost past
That part my love and me;
My longing eyes may hope at last
Their only wish to see.
But how, my Delia, will you meet
The man you've lost so long?
Will love in all your pulses beat,
And tremble on your tongue?
Will you in ev'ry look declare
Your heart is still the same;
And heal each idle anxious care
Our fears in absence frame?
Thus, Delia, thus I paint the scene
When shortly we shall meet,
And try what yet remains between
Of loit'ring time to cheat.
But if the dream that soothes my mind
Shall false and groundless prove;
If I am doom'd at length to find
You have forgot to love;
All I of Venus ask is this—
No more to let us join;
But grant me here the flatt'ring bliss,
To die and think you mine.

§ 92. Song. LYTTTELTON.

WHEN Delia on the plain appears,
 Aw'd by a thousand tender fears,
 I would approach, but dare not move;
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?
 Whene'er she speaks, my ravish'd ear
 No other voice but hers can hear,
 No other wit but hers approve;
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?
 If she some other swain commend,
 Though I was once his fondest friend,
 His instant enemy I prove;
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?
 When she is absent, I no more
 Delight in all that pleas'd before,
 The clearest spring, the shadiest grove;
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?
 When fond of pow'r, of beauty vain,
 Her nets she spread for ev'ry swain,
 I strove to hate, but vainly strove;
 Tell me, my heart, if this be love?

§ 93. Song. SOAME JENYNS.

Too plain, dear youth, these tell-tale eyes
 My heart your own declare;
 But for love's sake let it suffice
 You reign triumphant there.
 Forbear your utmost pow'r to try,
 Nor further urge your sway;
 Press not for what I must deny,
 For fear I should obey.
 Could all your arts successful prove,
 Would you a maid undo,
 Whose greatest failing is her love,
 And that her love for you?
 Say, would you use that very pow'r
 You from her fondness claim,
 To ruin in one fatal hour
 A life of spotless fame?
 Resolve not then to do an ill,
 Because perhaps you may;
 But rather use your utmost skill
 To save me, than betray.
 Be you yourself my virtue's guard;
 Defend, and not pursue;
 Since 'tis a task for me too hard
 To strive with love and you.

§ 94. Song. The Power of Music. LISLE.

WHEN Orpheus went down to the regions below,
 Which men are forbidden to see,
 He tun'd up his lyre, as old histories show,
 To set his Eurydice free.
 All hell was astonish'd a person so wise
 Should rashly endanger his life,
 And venture so far—but how vast their surprise,
 When they heard that he came for his wife!
 To find out a punishment due to his fault,
 Old Pluto long puzzled his brain;
 But hell had nought to torment sufficient, he thought—
 So he gave him his wife back again.

But pity succeeding found place in his heart;
 And, pleas'd with his playing so well,
 He took her again in reward of his art.
 Such power had music in hell!

§ 95. Song. ROWE.

To the brook and the willow, that heard him
 .Ah willow! willow! [complain,
 Poor Colin went weeping, and told him his pain, Sweet stream, he cried, sadly I'll teach thee to flow, [woe.
 And the waters shall rise to the brink with my
 All restless and painful my Celia now lies,
 And counts the sad moments of time as it flies:
 To the nymph, my heart's love, ye soft slumbers,
 repair,
 Spread your downy wings o'er her, and make her your care;
 Let me be left restless, mine eyes never close,
 So the sleep that I lose give my dear one repose.
 Sweet stream! if you chance by her pillow to
 creep,
 Perhaps your soft murmurs may lull her to sleep:
 But if I am doom'd to be wretched indeed,
 And the loss of my charmer the fates have decreed,
 Believe me, thou fair one, thou dear one, believe,
 Few sighs to thy loss, and few tears will I give;
 One fate to thy Colin and thee shall betide,
 And soon lay thy shepherd down by thy cold side.
 Then glide, gentle brook, and to lose thyself haste,
 Bear this to my willow; this verse is my last.
 Ah willow! willow! Ah willow! willow!

§ 96. Song.

DEAR Chloe, while thus beyond measure
 You treat me with doubts and disdain,
 You rob all your youth of its pleasure,
 And hoard up an old age of pain:
 Your maxim, that love is still founded
 On charms that will quickly decay—
 You will find to be very ill-grounded
 When once you its dictates obey.
 The passion from beauty first drawn,
 Your kindness will vastly improve;
 Soft looks and gay smiles are the dawn,
 Fruition's the sunshine of love:
 And though the bright beams of your eyes
 Should be clouded that now are so gay,
 And darkness obscure all the skies,
 We ne'er can forget it was day.
 Old Darby, with Joan by his side,
 You oft have regarded with wonder;
 He is dropsical, she is sore-ey'd,
 Yet they're ever uneasy asunder:
 Together they totter about,
 And sit in the sun at the door;
 And at night, when old Darby's pipe's out,
 His Joan will not smoke a whiff more.
 No beauty or wit they possess,
 Their several failings to smother;
 Then what are the charms, can you guess,
 That make them so fond of each other?
 'Tis the pleasing remembrance of youth,
 The endearments that love did bestow,
 The thoughts of past pleasure and truth,
 The best of all blessings below.

These traces for ever will last,
Which sickness nor time can remove;
For when youth and beauty are past,
And age brings the winter of love,
A friendship insensibly grows
By reviews of such raptures as these,
And the current of fondness still flows,
Which decrepit old age cannot freeze.

§ 97. Song. GILBERT COOPER.

AWAY! let nought to love displeasing,
My Winifreda, move thy fear;
Let nought delay the heavenly blessing,
Nor squeamish pride, nor gloomy care.
What though no grants of royal donors
With pompous titles grace our blood;
We'll shine in more substantial honours,
And to be noble, we'll be good.
What though from fortune's lavish bounty
No mighty treasures we possess;
We'll find within our pittance plenty,
And be content without excess.
Still shall each kind returning season
Sufficient for our wishes give;
For we will live a life of reason,
And that's the only life to live.
Our name, while virtue thus we tender,
Shall sweetly sound where'er 'tis spoke,
And all the great ones much shall wonder
How they admire such little folk.
Through youth and age, in love excelling,
We'll hand in hand together tread;
Sweet smiling peace shall crown our dwelling,
And babes, sweet smiling babes, our bed.
How should I love the pretty creatures,
Whilst round my knees they fondly clung,
To see them look their mother's features,
To hear them lisp their mother's tongue!
And when with envy Time transported
Shall think to rob us of our joys,
You'll in your girls again be courted,
And I'll go wooing in my boys.

§ 98. Song. PERCY.

O NANCY! wilt thou go with me,
Nor sigh to leave the flaunting town?
Can silent glens have charms for thee,
The lowly cot and russet gown?
No longer drest in silken sheen,
No longer deck'd with jewels rare,
Say, canst thou quit each courtly scene
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?
O Nancy! when thou'rt far away,
Wilt thou not cast a wish behind?
Say, canst thou face the parching ray,
Nor shrink before the wintry wind?
O can that soft and gentle mien
Extremes of hardship learn to bear,
Nor sad regret each courtly scene
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

O Nancy! canst thou love so true,
Through perils keen with me to go;
Or, when thy swain mishap shall rue,
To share with him the pang of woe?
Say, should disease or pain befall,
Wilt thou assume the nurse's care,
Nor wistful those gay scenes recall
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

And when at last thy love shall die,
Wilt thou receive his parting breath?
Wilt thou repress each struggling sigh,
And cheer with smiles the bed of death?
And wilt thou o'er his breathless clay
Strew flowers, and drop the tender tear?
Nor then regret those scenes so gay
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

§ 99. Song. MALLET.

THE smiling morn, the breathing spring,
Invite the tuneful birds to sing;
And, while they warble from each spray,
Love melts the universal lay.
Let us, Amanda, timely wise,
Like them improve the hour that flies;
And in soft raptures waste the day,
Among the shades of Endermay!

For soon the winter of the year,
And age, life's winter, will appear;
At this thy living bloom must fade,
As that will strip the verdant shade.
Our taste of pleasure then is o'er;
The feather'd songsters love no more:
And when they droop, and we decay,
Adieu the shades of Endermay.

§ 100. The Spanish Lady's Love.

WILL you hear a Spanish lady,
How she woo'd an English man?
Garments gay, as rich as may be,
Deck'd with jewels had she on:
Of a comely countenance and grace was she,
Both by birth and parentage of high degree.
As his prisoner there he kept her,
In his hands her life did lie;
Cupid's bands did tie them faster,
By the liking of an eye.
In his courteous company was all her joy,
To favour him in any thing she was not coy.
But at last there came commandment
For to set all ladies free,
With their jewels still adorned,
None to do them injury.
O then, said this lady gay, full woe is me!
O let me still sustain this kind captivity!
Gallant captain, show some pity
To a lady in distress;
Leave me not within this city,
For to die in heaviness:
Thou hast set, this present day, my body free,
But my heart in prison still remains with thee.

"How shouldst thou, fair lady, love me,
Whom thou know'st thy country's foe?
Thy fair words make me suspect thee;
Serpents lie where flowers grow."
All the harm I wish on thee, most courteous knight, [light!
God grant upon my head the same may fully

Blessed be the time and season
That thou cam'st on Spanish ground!
If you may our foes be termed,
Gentle foes we have you found:
With our city, you have won our hearts each one,
Then to your country bear away that is your own.

"Rest you still, most gallant lady:
Rest you still, and weep no more;
Of fair flowers you have plenty,
Spain doth yield you wondrous store."
Spaniards fraught with jealousy we oft do find,
But Englishmen throughout the world are counted kind.

Leave me not unto a Spaniard,
Thou alone enjoy'st my heart;
I am lovely, young, and tender,
Love is likewise my desert:
Still to serve thee day and night my mind is prest;
The wife of ev'ry Englishman is counted blest.

"It would be a shame, fair lady,
For to bear a woman hence;
English soldiers never carry
Any such without offence."
I will quickly change myself, if it be so,
And, like a page, will follow thee where'er
thou go.

"I have neither gold nor silver
To maintain thee in this case:
And to travel is great charges,
As you know, in ev'ry place."
My chains and jewels ev'ry one shall be thy own, [unknown.
And eke ten thousand pounds in gold that lies

"On the seas are many dangers,
Many storms do there arise,
Which will be to ladies dreadful,
And force tears from wat'ry eyes."
Well, in troth, I shall endure extremity,
For I could find in heart to lose my life for thee.

"Courteous lady, leave this folly,
Here comes all that breeds the strife;
I, in England, have already
A sweet woman to my wife;
I will not falsify my vow for gold nor gain,
Nor yet for all the fairest dames that live in Spain."

O how happy is that woman
That enjoys so true a friend;
Many happy days God send her!
And of my suit I'll make an end:
On my knees I pardon crave for my offence,
Which love and true affection did first commence.

Commend me to that gallant lady,
Bear to her this chain of gold,
With these bracelets for a token;
Grieving that I was so bold:
All my jewels, in like sort, take thou with thee;
For they are fitting for thy wife, but not for me.

I will spend my days in prayer,
Love and all his laws defy;
In a nunnery I will shroud me,
Far from any company:
But, ere my prayers have an end, be sure of this,
To pray for thee and for thy love I will not miss.

Thus farewell, most gallant captain!
Farewell to my heart's content!
Count not Spanish ladies wanton,
Though to thee my mind was bent:
Joy and true prosperity go still with thee!
"The like fall unto thy share, most fair lady!"

§ 101. Ballad. The Children in the Wood; or, The Norfolk Gentleman's last Will and Testament.

Now ponder well, you parents dear,
The words which I shall write;
A doleful story you shall hear,
In time brought forth to light.
A gentleman of good account
In Norfolk liv'd of late,
Whose wealth and riches did surmount
Most men of his estate.

Sore sick he was, and like to die,
No help that he could have;
His wife by him as sick did lie,
And both possess'd one grave.
No love between these two was lost,
Each was to other kind:
In love they liv'd, in love they died,
And left two babes behind:

The one a fine and pretty boy,
Not passing three years old;
The other a girl, more young than he,
And made in beauty's mould.
The father left his little son,
As plainly doth appear,
When he to perfect age should come,
Three hundred pounds a year;

And to his little daughter Jane
Five hundred pounds in gold,
To be paid down on marriage day,
Which might not be controll'd.
But if the children chanc'd to die
Ere they to age should come,
Their uncle should possess their wealth;
For so the will did run.

Now brother, said the dying man,
Look to my children dear;
Be good unto my boy and girl,
No friends else I have here:
To God and you I do commend
My children night and day;
But little while, be sure, we have
Within this world to stay.

You must be father and mother both,
 And uncle, all in one ;
 God knows what will become of them
 When I am dead and gone.
 With that bespake their mother dear :
 O brother kind, quoth she,
 You are the man must bring our babes
 To wealth or misery.

And if you keep them carefully,
 Then God will you reward ;
 If otherwise you seem to deal,
 God will your deeds regard.
 With lips as cold as any stone
 She kiss'd her children small :
 God bless you both, my children dear
 With that the tears did fall.

These speeches then their brother spoke
 To this sick couple there :
 The keeping of your children dear,
 Sweet sister, do not fear ;
 God never prosper me nor mine,
 Nor aught else that I have,
 If I do wrong your children dear,
 When you are laid in grave !

Their parents being dead and gone,
 The children home he takes,
 And brings them both unto his house,
 And much of them he makes.
 He had not kept these pretty babes
 A twelvemonth and a day,
 When for their wealth he did devise
 To make them both away.

He bargain'd with two ruffians rude,
 Which were of furious mood,
 That they should take the children young,
 And slay them in a wood.
 He told his wife, and all he had,
 He did the children send
 To be brought up in fair London,
 With one that was his friend.

Away then went these pretty babes,
 Rejoicing at that tide ;
 Rejoicing with a merry mind,
 They should on cock-horse ride.
 They prate and prattle pleasantly,
 As they rode on the way,
 To those that should their butchers be,
 And work their lives' decay.

So that the pretty speech they had,
 Made murd'ers' hearts relent ;
 And they that undertook the deed
 Full sore they did repent.
 Yet one of them, more hard of heart,
 Did vow to do his charge,
 Because the wretch that hired him
 Had paid him very large.

The other would not agree thereto,
 So here they fell at strife ;
 With one another they did fight
 About the children's life.
 And he that was of mildest mood
 Did slay the other there,
 Within an unfrequented wood ;
 While babes did quake for fear.

He took the children by the hand,
 When tears stood in their eye ;
 And bade them come and go with him,
 And look they did not cry :
 And two long miles he led them on,
 While they for food complain :
 Stay here, quoth he, I'll bring you bread,
 When I do come again.

These pretty babes with hand in hand
 Went wandering up and down :
 But never more they saw the man
 Approaching from the town.
 Their pretty lips with blackberries
 Were all besmear'd and dy'd ;
 And when they saw the darksome night,
 They sat them down and cried.

Thus wander'd these two pretty babes,
 Till death did end their grief ;
 In one another's arms they died,
 As babes wanting relief.
 No burial these pretty babes
 Of any man receives,
 Till Robin-red-breast painfully
 Did cover them with leaves.

And now the heavy wrath of God
 Upon their uncle fell ;
 Yea, fearful fiends did haunt his house,
 His conscience felt a hell.
 His barns were fir'd, his goods consum'd,
 His lands were barren made,
 His cattle died within the field,
 And nothing with him staid.

And, in the voyage of Portugal,
 Two of his sons did die ;
 And, to conclude, himself was brought
 To extreme misery :
 He pawn'd and mortgag'd all his land
 Ere seven years came about ;
 And now at length this wicked act
 Did by this means come out :

The fellow that did take in hand
 These children for to kill,
 Was for a robbery judg'd to die,
 As was God's blessed will ;
 Who did confess the very truth,
 The which is here express'd ;
 Their uncle died, while he for debt
 In prison long did rest.

All you that be executors made,
 And overseers eke,
 Of children that be fatherless,
 And infants mild and meek :
 Take you example by this thing,
 And give to each his right ;
 Lest God with such like misery,
 Your wicked minds requite.

§ 102. Ballad. The Hunting in Chevy Chase.

God prosper long our noble king,
 Our lives and safeties all !
 A woeful hunting once there did
 In Chevy Chase befall.

To drive the deer with hound and horn
 Earl Percy took his way;
 The child may rue that is unborn
 The hunting of that day.

The stout Earl of Northumberland
 A vow to God did make,
 His pleasure in the Scottish woods
 Three summer's days to take;

The chiefest harts in Chevy Chase
 To kill and bear away.

The tidings to Earl Douglas came
 In Scotland, where he lay;

Who sent Earl Percy present word
 He would prevent his sport.

The English earl, not fearing this,
 Did to the woods resort,

With fifteen hundred bowmen bold,
 All chosen men of might;
 Who knew full well, in time of need,
 To aim their shafts aright.

The gallant greyhounds swiftly ran,
 To chase the fallow deer;
 On Monday they began to hunt,
 When day-light did appear;

And, long before high noon, they had
 A hundred fat bucks slain;
 Then, having din'd, the drovers went
 To rouse them up again.

The bowmen muster'd on the hills,
 Well able to endure;
 Their back-sides all, with special care,
 That day were guarded sure.

The hounds ran swiftly through the woods,
 The nimble deer to take;
 And with their cries the hills and dales
 An echo shrill did make.

Lord Percy to the quarry went,
 To view the slaughter'd deer;
 Quoth he, Earl Douglas promised
 This day to meet me here:

If that I thought he would not come,
 No longer would I stay.
 With that a brave young gentleman
 Thus to the earl did say:

Lo! yonder doth Earl Douglas come,
 His men in armour bright;
 Full twenty hundred Scottish spears
 All marching in our sight;

All men of pleasant Tividale,
 Fast by the river Tweed.
 Then cease your sport, Earl Percy said,
 And take your bows with speed:

And now with me, my countrymen,
 Your courage forth advance;
 For never was there champion yet,
 In Scotland or in France,

That ever did on horseback come,
 But, if my hap it were,
 I durst encounter man for man,
 With him to break a spear.

Earl Douglas on a milk-white steed,
 Most like a baron bold,
 Rode foremost of the company,
 Whose armour shone like gold:

Show me, said he, whose men you be,
 That hunt so boldly here;
 That, without my consent, do chase
 And kill my fallow-deer?

The man that first did answer make,
 Was noble Percy he:
 Who said, We list not to declare,
 Nor show whose men we be:

Yet will we spend our dearest blood,
 Thy chiefest harts to slay.
 Then Douglas swore a solemn oath,
 And thus in rage did say:

Ere thus I will out-braved be,
 One of us two shall die:
 I know thee well; an earl thou art,
 Lord Percy: so am I.

But trust me, Percy, pity it were,
 And great offence, to kill
 Any of these our harmless men,
 For they have done no ill.

Let thou and I the battle try,
 And set our men aside.
 Accurs'd be he, Lord Percy said,
 By whom this is denied.

Then stepp'd a gallant squire forth,
 Witherington was his name,
 Who said, I would not have it told
 To Henry our king, for shame,

That e'er my captain fought on foot,
 And I stood looking on:
 You be two earls, said Witherington,
 And I a squire alone:

I'll do the best that do I may,
 While I have strength to stand:
 While I have pow'r to wield my sword,
 I'll fight with heart and hand.

Our English archers bent their bows,
 Their hearts were good and true;
 At the first flight of arrows sent,
 Full threescore Scots they slew.

To drive the deer with hound and horn,
 Earl Douglas had the bent;
 A captain mov'd with mickle pride,
 The spears to shivers sent.

They clos'd full fast on ev'ry side,
 No slackness there was found;
 And many a gallant gentleman
 Lay gasping on the ground.

O Christ! it was a grief to see,
 And likewise for to hear
 The cries of men lying in their gore,
 And scatter'd here and there.

At last these two stout earls did meet,
 Like captains of great might;
 Like lions mov'd, they laid on load,
 And made a cruel fight.

They fought until they both did sweat,
With swords of temper'd steel;
Until the blood, like drops of rain,
They trickling down did feel.

Yield thee, Lord Percy, Douglas said;
In faith I will thee bring,
Where thou shalt high advanced be,
By James our Scottish king.

Thy ransom I will freely give,
And thus report of thee:
Thou art the most courageous knight
That ever I did see.

No, Douglas, quoth Earl Percy then,
Thy proffer I do scorn;
I will not yield to any Scot
That ever yet was born.

With that there came an arrow keen
Out of an English bow,
Which struck Earl Douglas to the heart,
A deep and deadly blow:

Who never spoke more words than these:
Fight on, my merry men all;
For why? my life is at an end:
Lord Percy sees my fall.

Then leaving life, Earl Percy took
The dead man by the hand:
And said, Earl Douglas, for thy life
Would I have lost my land!

O Christ! my very heart doth bleed
With sorrow for thy sake;
For sure a more renowned knight
Mischance did never take.

A knight amongst the Scots there was,
Which saw Earl Douglas die,
Who straight in wrath did vow revenge
Upon the Earl Percy.

Sir Hugh Montgomery he was call'd;
Who, with a spear most bright,
Well mounted on a gallant steed,
Ran fiercely through the fight:

And pass'd the English archers all,
Without all dread or fear;
And through Earl Percy's body then
He thrust his hateful spear.

With such a vehement force and might
He did his body gore,
The spear went through the other side
A large cloth-yard, and more.

So thus did both these nobles die,
Whose courage none could stain.
An English archer then perceiv'd
The noble earl was slain;

He had a bow bent in his hand,
Made of a trusty tree;
An arrow of a cloth-yard long
Up to the head drew he:

Against Sir Hugh Montgomery
So right the shaft he set,
The grey-goose wing that was thereon
In his heart-blood was wet.

This fight did last from break of day
Till setting of the sun;
For when they rung the evening-bell
The battle scarce was done.

With the Earl Percy there was slain
Sir John of Ogerton,
Sir Robert Ratcliff, and Sir John,
Sir James that bold baron:

And with Sir George, and good Sir James,
Both knights of good account,
Good Sir Ralph Raby there was slain,
Whose prowess did surmount.

For Witherington needs must I wail,
As one in doleful dumps;
For, when his legs were smitten off,
He fought upon his stumps.

And with Earl Douglas there was slain
Sir Hugh Montgomery;
Sir Charles Currel, that from the field
One foot would never fly;

Sir Charles Murrel of Ratcliffe too,
His sister's son was he:
Sir David Lamb, so well esteem'd,
Yet saved could not be.

And the Lord Maxwell, in like wise,
Did with Earl Douglas die:
Of twenty hundred Scottish spears,
Scarce fifty-five did fly.

Of fifteen hundred Englishmen
Went home but fifty-three;
The rest were slain in Chevy Chase,
Under the greenwood-tree.

Next day did many widows come,
Their husbands to bewail;
They wash'd their wounds in brinish tears,
But all would not prevail.

Their bodies, bath'd in purple blood,
They bore with them away;
They kiss'd them dead a thousand times
When they were clad in clay.

This news was brought to Edinburgh,
Where Scotland's king did reign,
That brave Earl Douglas suddenly
Was with an arrow slain.

O heavy news! king James did say;
Scotland can witness be,
I have not any captain more
Of such account as he.

Like tidings to King Henry came,
Within as short a space,
That Percy of Northumberland
Was slain in Chevy Chase.

Now God be with him, said our king,
Sith 'twill no better be;
I trust I have within my realm
Five hundred good as he.

Yet shall not Scot nor Scotland say,
But I will vengeance take;
And be revenged on them all
For brave Lord Percy's sake.

This vow full well the king perform'd,
 After, on Humbledown.
 In one day fifty knights were slain,
 With lords of great renown :
 And of the rest, of small account,
 Did many hundreds die.
 Thus ended the hunting of Chevy Chase,
 Made by the Earl Percy.
 God save the king, and bless the land
 In plenty, joy, and peace;
 And grant henceforth, that foul debate
 Twixt noblemen may cease.

§ 103. Song. Sir Cauline.

There is something peculiar in the metre of this old ballad; it is unusual to meet with redundant stanzas of six lines; but the occasional insertion of a double third or fourth line, as ver. 31, 44, &c. is an irregularity I do not remember to have seen elsewhere.
 It may be proper to inform the reader before he comes to Pt. 2, ver. 110, 111, that the round table was not peculiar to the reign of king Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. The proclaiming a great tournament (probably with some peculiar solemnities) was called "holding a Round Table." Dugdale tells us, that the great baron Roger de Mortimer, "having procured the honor of knighthood to be conferred 'on his three sons' by king Edward I. he, at his own costs, caused a tournament to be held at Kenilworth, where he sumptuously entertained an hundred knights and as many ladies, for three days; the like whereof was never before in England; and there began the round table, (so called by reason that the place wherein they practised those feats was environed with a strong wall made in a round form :) and upon the fourth day, the golden lion, in sign of triumph, being yielded to him, he carried it (with all the company) to Warwick." It may further be added that Matthew Paris frequently calls jousts and tournaments Hastiludia Mensæ Rotundæ.

As to what will be observed in this ballad, of the art of healing being practised by a young princess; it is no more than what is usual in all the old romances, and was conformable to real manners; it being a practice derived from the earliest times among all the Gothic and Celtic nations, for women, even of the highest rank, to exercise the art of surgery. In the Northern Chronicles we also find the young damsels stanching the wounds of their lovers, and the wives those of their husbands. And even so late as the time of queen Elizabeth, it is mentioned among the accomplishments of the ladies of her court, that "the eldest of them are skilful in surgery." See Harrison's Description of England, prefixed to Hollingshed's Chronicle, &c.

The First Part.

In Ireland, ferr over the sea,
 There dwelleth a bonnye kinge;
 And with him a yong and comlye knighte,
 Men call him Syr Cauline.
 The kinge had a lady to his daughter,
 In fashyon she hath no peere;
 And princely wightes that ladye wooed,
 To be theyr wedded feere.
 Syr Cauline loveth her best of all,
 But nothing durst he saye;
 Ne descreeve his counsayl to no man
 But dearlye he lovde this may.

Till on a daye it so beffell,
 Great dill to him was dight;
 The maydens love removde his mind,
 To care-bed went the knighte.
 One while he spred his arms him fro,
 One while he spred them nye;
 And aye! but I winne that ladyes love,
 For dole now I mun dye.
 And when our parish-masse was done,
 Our kinge was bowne to dyne:
 He says, Where is Syr Cauline,
 That is wont to serve the wyne?
 Then aunswerde him a courteous knighte,
 And fast his handes gan wringe:
 Syr Cauline is sick and like to dye
 Without a good leechinge.
 Fetche me downe my daughter deere,
 She is a leecher fulle fine:
 Goe take him doughe, and the baken bread,
 And serve him with the wyne soe red;
 Lothe I were him to tine.
 Fair Christabelle to his chaumber goes,
 Her maydens followyng nye:
 O well, she sayth, how doth my lord?
 O sicke, thou fayre ladye.
 Now ryse up wightlye, man, for shame,
 Never lye soe cowardlee;
 For it is told in my father's halle,
 You dye for love of mee.
 Fayre ladye, it is for your love
 That all this dill I drye:
 For if you wold comfort me with a kisse,
 Then were I brought from bale to blisse,
 No longer would I lye.
 Syr knighte, my father is a kinge,
 I am his only heire;
 Alas! and well you knowe, syr knighte,
 I never can be your feere.
 O ladye, thou art a kinges daughtér,
 And I am not thy peere,
 But let me doe some deedes of armes,
 To be youre bacheleere.
 Some deedes of armes if thou wilt doe,
 My bacheleere to be,
 (But ever and aye my heart would rue,
 Giff harm should happe to thee.)
 Upon Eldridge hill there groweth a thorne,
 Upon the mores brodinge;
 And dare ye, syr knighte, wake there all nighte,
 Untill the fair morninge?
 For the Eldridge knighte, so mickle of mighte,
 Will examine you beforne;
 And never man bare life away,
 But he did him scath and scorne.
 That knighte he is a foul paynim,
 And large of limb and bone;
 And but if heaven may be thy speede,
 Thy life it is but gone.
 Nowe on the Eldridge hills Ile walke,
 For thy sake, fair ladie;
 And Ile either bring you a ready token,
 Or Ile never more you see.

The ladye is gone to her own chaumbère,
Her maydens following bright :
Syr Cauline lop'd from care-bed soone,
And to the Eldridge hills is gone,
For to wake there all night.

Unto midnight, that the moone did rise,
He walked up and downe ;
Then a lightsome bugle heard he blowe
Over the bents soe browne.
Quoth hee, If cryance come till my heart,
I am ffar from any good towne.

And soon he spyde on the mores so broad
A furyous wight and fell ;
A ladye bright his brydle led,
Clad in a fayre kyrtell :

And soe fast he called on syr Cauline,
O man, I reede thee flye,
For but if cryance come till thy heart,
I weene but thou mun dye.

He sayth, No cryance comes till my heart,
Nor, in fayth, I will not flee ;
For, cause thou minged not Christ before,
The less me dreadeth thee.

The Eldridge knight he pricked his steed ;
Syr Cauline bold abode :
Then either shooke his trustye speare,
And the timber these two children * bare
So soon in sunder slode.

Then took they out theyr two good swordes,
And layden on full faste,
Till helme and hawkbere, mail and sheelde,
They all were well-nye brast.

The Eldridge knight was mickle of might,
And stiffe in stower did stand ;
But syr Cauline with a backward stroke
He smote off his right hand ;
That soone he with paine and lacke of bloud
Fell downe on that lay-land.

Then up syr Cauline lift his brande
All over his head so hye :
And here I sweare by the holy roode,
Nowe, caytiffe, thou shalt dye.

Then up and came that ladye brighte,
Faste wringing of her hande :
For the maydens love, that most you love,
Withhold that deadly brande :

For the maydens love, that most you love,
Now smyte no more I praye ;
And aye whatever thou wilt, my lord,
He shall thy hests obaye.

Now swear to mee, thou Eldridge knighte,
And here on this lay-land,
That thou wilt believe on Christ his laye,
And thereto plight thy hand :

And that thou never on Eldridge come
To sporte, gamon, or playe ;
And that thou here give up thy armes
Until thy dying day.

The Eldridge knighte gave up his armes
With many a sorrowfulle sighe ;
And sware to obey syr Caulines hest,
Till the time that he shold dye.

And he then up, and the Eldridge knighte
Sett him in his saddle annone,
And the Eldridge knighte and his ladye
To theyr castle they are gone.

Then he tooke up the bloody hand,
That was so large of bone,
And on it he founde five ringes of gold
Of knightes that had been slone.

Then he tooke up the Eldridge sworde,
As hard as any flint ;
And he took off those ringes five
As bright as fire and brent.

Home then pricked syr Cauline
As light as leafe on tree :
I wys he neither stint ne blanne,
Till he his ladye see.

Then downe he knelt upon his knee
Before that ladye gay :
O ladye, I have been on the Eldridge hills :
These tokens I bring way.

Now welcome, welcome, syr Cauline,
Thrice welcome unto mee,
For now I perceiue thou art a true knighte,
Of valor bold and free.

O ladye, I am thy own true knighte,
Thy hests for to obaye ;
And mought I hope to winne thy love!—
Ne more his tonge colde say.

The ladye blushed searlette redde,
And fette a gentill sighe :
Alas! sir knighte, how may this bee,
For my degree's soe highe?

But sith thou hast hight, thou comely youth,
To be my batchilere,
Ile promise if thee I may not wedde
I will have none other fere.

Then shee held forthe her lily-white hand
Towards that knighte so free :
He gave to it one gentill kisse,
His heart was brought from bale to blisse,
The teares sterte from his ee.

But keep my counsayl, syr Cauline,
Ne let no man it knowe ;
For an ever my father sholde it ken,
I wot he wolde us sloe.

From that day forthe that ladye fayre
Lovde syr Cauline the knighte :
From that daye forthe he only joyde
Whan shee was in his sight.

Part the Second.

EVERYE white will have its blacke,
And every sweete its sowre :
This found the ladye Christabelle
In an untimely howre.

* Knights.

For so it befelle, as syr Cauline
 Was with that ladye faire,
 The king her father walked forth
 To take the evenyng aire :
 And into the arbour as he went
 To rest his wearye feet,
 He found his daughter and syr Cauline
 There sette in daliaunce sweet.
 The king hee sterted forth, iwys,
 And an angrie man was hee :
 Now, traytoure, thou shalt hange or drawe,
 And rewe shall thy ladie.
 Then forth syr Cauline he was ledde,
 And throwne in dungeon deepe ;
 And the ladye into a towre so hye,
 There left to wayle and weepe.
 The queene she was syr Caulines friend,
 And to the kinge said she :
 I pray you save syr Caulines life,
 And let him banisht bee.
 Now, dame, that traitor shall be sent
 Across the salt sea fome :
 But here I will make with thee a band,
 If ever he come within this land,
 A foule deathe is his doome.
 All woe-begone was that gentill knight
 To parte from his ladye ;
 And many a time he sighed sore,
 And caste a wistfulle eye :
 Faire Christabelle, from thee to parte,
 Farre lever had I dye.
 Faire Christabelle, that ladye brighte,
 Was had forth of the towre :
 But ever shee droopeth in her minde,
 As, nipt by an ungentle winde,
 Doth some faire lillye flowre.
 And ever shee doth lament and weepe
 To tint her lover soe ;
 Syr Cauline, thou little think'st on mee,
 But I will still be true.
 Manye a kinge, and manye a duke,
 And lords of high degree,
 Did sue to that fayre ladye of love ;
 But never she wolde them nee.
 When many a daye was past and gone,
 Ne comforte she colde finde,
 The kinge proclaimed a tourneament,
 To cheere his daughters mind :
 And there came lords, and there came knightes,
 Fro manye a farre countrye
 To break a spere for theyr ladyes love,
 Before that faire ladye.
 And many a ladye there was sette
 In purple and in palle ;
 But faire Christabelle soe woe-begone
 Was the fayrest of them all.
 Then many a knighte was mickle of might
 Before his ladye gaye :
 But a stranger wight, whom no man knewe,
 He wan the prize eche daye.

His acton it was all of blacke,
 His hewberke and his sheelde,
 Ne noe man wist whence he did come,
 Ne noe man knew where he did gone
 When they came out the feelde.
 And now three days were prestlye past
 In feats of chivalrye,
 When lo, upon the fourth morninge
 A sorrowfulle sight they see.
 A hugye giaunt stiff and starke,
 All foule of limbe and lere ;
 Two goggling eyen like fire farden,
 A mouthe from eare to eare.
 Before him came a dwarffe full lowe,
 That waited on his knee ;
 And at his backe five heads he bare,
 All wan and pale of blee.
 Sir, quoth the dwarffe, and louted lowe,
 Behold that hend soldain !
 Behold these heads I bear with me !
 They are kings which he hath slain.
 The Eldridge knighte is his own cousine,
 Whom a knighte of thine hath shent :
 And hee is come to avenge his wrong ;
 And to thee, all thy knightes among,
 Defiance here hath sent.
 But yette he will appease his wrath
 Thy daughters love to winne :
 And but thou yeelde him that fayre mayd,
 Thy halls and towers must brenne.
 Thy head, syr king, must go with mee ;
 Or else thy daughter deere ;
 Or else within these lists soe broad
 Thou must find him a peere.
 The king he turned him round aboute,
 And in his heart was woe ;
 Is there never a knighte of my round table,
 This matter will undergo ?
 Is there never a knighte amongst yee all
 Will fight for my daughter and mee ?
 Whoever will fight yon grimme soldan,
 Right faire his meede shall be ;
 For he shall have my broad lay-lands,
 And of my crowne be heyre ;
 And he shall winne fayre Christabelle,
 To be his wedded fere.
 But every knighte of his round table
 Did stand both still and pale ;
 For whenever they lookt on the grim soldan,
 It made their hearts to quail.
 All woe-begone was that fayre ladye,
 When she saw no helpe was nye :
 She cast her thought on her own true-love,
 And the teares gasht from her eye.
 Up then sterte the stranger knighte,
 Said, Ladye, be not affray'd ;
 Ile fight for thee with this grimme soldan,
 Thoughe he be unmacklye made.
 And if thou wilt lend me the Eldridge sworde,
 That lyeth within thy bowre,
 I trust in Christe for to slay this fiende,
 Thoughe he be stiffe in stowre.

Goe fetch him downe the Eldridge sworde,
The kinge he cryde, with speede:
Nowe heaven assist thee, courteous knighte;
My daughter is thy meede.

The gyaunt he stepped into the lists,
And sayd, Awaye, awaye:
I sweare, as I am the hend soldan,
Thou lettest me here all daye.

Then forth the stranger knighte he came
In his blacke armour dight:
The ladye sighed a gentle sighe,
"That this were my true knighte!"

And now the gyaunt and knighte be mett
Within the lists so broad:
And now with swordes so sharp of steele,
They gan to lay on load.

The soldan stricke the knighte a stroke,
That made him reele asyde:
Then woe-begone was that faire ladye,
And thrice she deeply sighde.

The soldan stricke a second stroke,
And made the bloude to flowe:
All pale and wan was that ladye fayre,
And thrice she wept for woe.

The soldan stricke a third fell stroke,
Which brought the knighte on his knee;
Sad sorrow pierced that ladyes heart,
And she shriekt loud shriekings three.

The knighte he leapt upon his feete,
All recklesse of the paine;
Quoth he, But heaven be now my speede,
Or else I shall be slaine.

He grasped his sword with mayne and mighte,
And spying a secrette part,
He drave it into the soldan's syde,
And pierced him to the heart.

Then all the people gave a shoute,
When they sawe the soldan falle:
The ladye wept, and thanked Christ,
That had reskewed her from thrall.

And nowe the kinge with all his barons
Rose uppe from off his seate,
And downe he stepped into the listes,
That curteous knighte to greete.

But he for paine and lacke of bloude
Was fallen into a swounde,
And there all waltering in his gore,
Lay lifelesse on the grounde.

Come downe, come downe, my daughter deare,
Thou art a leech of skille;
Farre lever had I lose half my landes,
Than this good knighte sholde spille.

Down then stepped that faire ladye,
To helpe him if she maye;
But when she did his beavere raise,
It is my life, my lord, she sayes,
And shriekte and swound awaye.

Sir Cauline juste lifte up his eyes
When he heard his ladye crye:
O ladye, I am thine owne true love;
For thee I wisht to dye.

Then giving her one partinge looke,
He closed his eyes in death,
Ere Christabelle, that ladye milde,
Began to draw her breathe.

But when she founde her comelye knighte
Indeed was dead and gone,
She layd her pale cold cheeke to his,
And thus she made her moane:

O staye, my deare and onlye lord,
For me thy faithful feere;
'Tis meet that I shold followe thee,
Who hast bought my love soe deare.

Then fayntinge in a deadly swoune,
And with a deep-fette sighe
That burst her gentle heart in twayne,
Fayre Christabelle did dye.

§ 104. Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne.

"In this time (about the year 1190, in the reign of Richard I.) were many robbers and out-lawes, among the which Robin Hood and Little John, renowned theeves, continued in woods, despoiling and robbing the goods of the rich. They killed none but such as would invade them; or by resistance for their own defence.

"The said Robert entertained an hundred tall men and good archers with such spoiles and thefts as he got, upon whom four hundred (were they ever so strong) durst not give the onset. He suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poore men's goods he spared, abundantlie relieving them with that, which by theft he got from abbeyes and the houses of rich carles; whom Maior the historian blameth for his rapine and theft, but of all theeves he affirmeth him to be the prince and the most gentle theefe." Stowe's Annals, p. 159.

WHAN shaws beene sheene, and shraddes full
fayre,

And leaves both large and longe,
Itt's merrye walkyng in the fayre forrest
To hear the small birdes songe.

The woodweele sang, and wold not cease,
Sitting upon the spraye,
So lowde, he wakened Robin Hood,
In the greenwood where he lay.

Now by my faye, said jollye Robin,
A sweaven I had this night;
I dreamt me of tow wighty yemen,
That fast with me gan fight.

Methought they did me beat and binde,
And tooke my bowe me froe;
Iff I be Robin alive in this lande,
Ile be wroken on them towe.

Sweavens are swift, sayd Lyttle John,
As the wind blowes over the hill;
For iff it be never so loude this night,
To-morrow it may be still.

Buske yee, bowne yee, my merry men all,
And John shall goe with mee,
For Ile goe seeke yond wighty yeomen,
In greenwood where they bee.

They then cast on theyr gownes of grene,
And took theyr bowes each one;
And they away to the grene forrest
A shooting forth are gone;

Untill they came to the merry greenwood,
 Where they had gladdest to bee :
 There they were ware of a wight yeoman,
 That leaned against a tree.
 A sworde and a dagger he wore by his side,
 Of manye a man the bane ;
 And he was clad in his capull hyde
 Top and tayll and mayne.
 Stand still, master, quoth Lyttle John,
 Under this tree so green,
 And I will go to yond wight yeoman
 To know what he doth meane.
 Ah! John, by me thou settest noe store,
 And that I farley finde :
 How often send I my men before,
 And tarry myselfe behinde ?
 It is no cunning a knave to ken,
 An a man but heare him speake ;
 An it were not for bursting of my bowe,
 John, I thy head would breake.
 As often wordes they breeden bale,
 So they parted Robin and John ;
 And John is gone to Barnesdale,
 The gates * he knoweth eche one.
 But when he came to Barnesdale,
 Great heavinesse there hee hadd,
 For he found tow of his owne fellows
 Were slaine both in a slade,
 And Scarlette he was flying a-foote
 Fast over stocke and stone,
 For the proud sheriffe with seven score men
 Fast after him is gone.
 One shoote now I will shoote, quoth John,
 With Christ his might and mayne ;
 Ile make yond sheriffe that wends so fast,
 To stopp he shall be fayne.
 Then John bent up his long bende-bowe,
 And fettled him to shoote :
 The bow was made of tender boughe,
 And fell downe at his foote.
 Woe worth, woe worth thee, wicked wood,
 That ever thou grew on a tree ;
 For now this day thou art my bale,
 My boote when thou shold bee.
 His shoote it was but loosely shott,
 Yet flew not the arrowe in vaine,
 For it mett one of the sheriffes men,
 And William a Trent was slaine.
 It had bene better of William a Trent
 To have bene abed with sorrowe,
 Than to be that day in the greenwood slade
 To meet with Little John's arrowe.
 But as it is said, when men be mett,
 Fyve can doe more than three,
 The sheriffe hath taken Little John,
 And bound him fast to a tree.
 Thou shalt be drawen by dale and downe,
 And hanged hye on a hill.
 But thou mayst fayle of thy purpose, quoth
 If it be Christ his will. [John,

Lett us leave talking of Little John,
 And thinke of Robin Hood,
 How he is gone to the wight yeoman,
 Where under the leaves he stood.
 Good morrow, good fellowe, sayd Robin so
 fayre,
 Good morrow, good fellow, quo he :
 Methinks, by this bowe thou beares in thy hande,
 A good archere thou sholdst bee.
 I am wilfulle of my waye, quo' the yeman,
 And of my morning tyde.
 Ile lead thee through the wood, sayd Robin :
 Good fellow, Ile be thy guide.
 I seeke an outlawe, the straunger sayd,
 Men call him Robin Hood ;
 Rather I'd meet with that proud outlawe
 Than fortye pound soe good.
 Now come with me, thou wighty yeman,
 And Robin thou soone shalt see :
 But first let us some pastime find
 Under the greenwood tree.
 First let us some masterye make
 Among the woods so even,
 We may chance to meet with Robin Hood
 Here at some unsett steven.
 They cut them down two summer shroggs,
 That grew both under a breere,
 And set them threescore rood in twaine
 To shoote the prickes y-fere.
 Leade on, good fellowe, quoth Robin Hood,
 Leade on, I do bidd thee.
 Nay by my faith, good fellowe, hee sayd,
 My leader thou shalt bee.
 The first time Robin shot at the pricke,
 He mist but an inch it fro :
 The yeoman he was an archer good,
 But he cold never do soe.
 The second shoote had the wightye yeman,
 He shot within the garland :
 But Robin he shot far better than hee,
 For he clave the good prick-wande.
 A blessing upon thy heart, he sayd ;
 Goode fellowe, thy shooting is goode ;
 For an thy heart be as good as thy hand,
 Thou wert better than Robin Hood.
 Now tell me thy name, good fellowe, sayd he,
 Under the leaves of lyne.
 Nay by my faith, quoth bolde Robin,
 Till thou have told me thine.
 I dwelle by dale and downe, quoth hee,
 And Robin to take Ime sworne ;
 And when I am called by my right name
 I am Guy of good Gisborne.
 My dwelling is in this wood, says Robin,
 By thee I set right nought :
 I am Robin Hood of Barnesdale,
 Whom thou so long has sought.

* Ways, passes, paths.

He that had neyther been kithe nor kin,
Might have seen a full sayre sight,
To see how together these yeomen went
With blades both browne and bright :

To see how these yeomen together they fought,
Two howres of a summer's day :
Yet neither Robin Hood nor Sir Guy
Them fettled to fly awaye.

Robin was reachles on a roote,
And stumbled at that tyde ;
And Guy was quicke and nimble withall,
And hitt him upon the syde.

Ah deere Ladye, said Robin Hood, thou
That art both mother and may,
I think it was never mans destinye
To dye before his day.

Robin thought on our Ladye deere,
And soon leapt up againe ;
And strait he came with a backward stroke,
And he Sir Guy hath slayne.

He took Sir Guys head by the hayre,
And stuck it upon his bowes end :
Thou hast been a traytor all thy life,
Which thing must have an end.

Robin pulled forth an Irysh knife,
And nicked Sir Guy in the face,
That he was never on woman born
Cold know whose head it was.

Sayes, Lye there, lye there, now, Sir Guye,
And with me be not wrothe :
Iff thou have had the worst strokes at my hand,
Thou shalt have the better clothe.

Robin did off his gowne of greene,
And on Sir Guy did throwe,
And he put on that capull hyde,
That clad him topp to toe.

Thy bowe, thy arrows, and little horne,
Now with me I will beare ;
For I will away to Barnesdale,
To see how my men doe fare.

Robin Hood sett Guys horne to his mouth,
And a loud blast in it did blow,
That beheard the sheriffe of Nottingham,
As he leaned under a lowe.

Hearken, hearken, sayd the sheriffe,
I heare nowe tydings good,
For yonder I hear Sir Guyes horne blowe,
And he hath slaine Robin Hoode.

Yonder I heare Sir Guyes horne blowe,
Itt blowes soe well in tyde ;
And yonder comes that wightye yeoman,
Cladd in his capull hyde.

Come hyther, come hyther, thou good Sir Guy,
Aske what thou wilt of mee.
O I will none of thy gold, sayd Robin,
Nor I will none of thy fee :

But now I have slaine the master, he sayes,
Lett me goe strike the knave ;
For this is all the meede I aske,
None other reward Ile have.

Thou art a madman, sayd the sheriffe,
Thou sholdst have had a knightes fee :
But seeing thy asking hath beene soe bad,
Well granted it shall bee.

When Little John heard his master speake,
Well knew he it was his steven :
Now shall I bee looset, quoth Little John,
With Christ his might in heaven.

Fast Robin hee hyed him to Little John,
He thought to loose him blive ;
The sheriffe and all his companye
Fast after him gan drive.

Stand abacke, stand abacke, sayd Robin ;
Why draw you me so neere ?
Itt was never the use in our countrye,
Ones shrift another shold heere.

But Robin pulled forth an Irysh knife,
And losed John hand and foote,
And gave him Sir Guyes bow into his hand,
And bade it be his boote.

Then John he took Guyes bow in his hand,
His bolts and arrowes eche one ;
When the sheriffe saw Little John bend his bow,
He fettled him to be gone.

Towards his house in Nottingham towne
He fled full fast away :
And so did all the companye :
Not one behind wold stay.

But he cold neither runne soe fast,
Nor away so fast cold ryde,
But Little John with an arrowe soe broad,
He shott him into the backe-syde.

§ 105. Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, and William of Cloudestly.

They were three noted outlaws, whose skill in archery rendered them formerly as famous in the North of England, as Robin Hood and his fellows were in the midland counties. Their place of residence was in the forest of Englewood, not far from Carlisle (called corruptly in the ballad English-wood, whereas Engle or Ingle wood signifies wood for firing). At what time they lived does not appear. The author of the common ballad on the pedigree, education, and marriage, of Robin Hood, makes them contemporary with Robin Hood's father, in order to give him the honor of beating them ; viz.

The father of Robin a forester was,
And he shot in a lusty long bow
Two north-country miles and an inch at a shot,
As the pinder of Wakefield does know ;

For he brought Adam Bell, and Clim of the Clough,
And William of Clowdeslee,
To shoot with our forester for forty mark ;
And our forester beat them all three.

Collect. of Old Ballads, 1727, 1st vol. p. 67.

This seems to prove that they were commonly thought to have lived before the popular hero of Sherwood.

I have only to add further concerning the principal hero of this ballad, that the Bells were noted rogues in the north so late as the time of Q. Elizabeth. See, in Rymer's Fœdera, a letter from Lord William Howard to some of the officers of state, wherein he mentions them.

Part the First.

MERY it was in grene forèst
 Among the levès grene,
 Whereas men hunt east and west
 Wyth bowes and arrowes kene ;
 To ryse the dère out of theyr denne :
 Suche sightes hath ofte bene sene ;
 As by thre yemen of the north countrey,
 By them it is I meane.
 The one of them hight Adam Bel,
 The other Clym of the Clough*,
 The thyrd was William of Cloudesly,
 An archer good ynough.
 They were outlawed for venyson,
 These yemen everchone ;
 They swore them brethren upon a day,
 To Englyshe wood for to gone.
 Now lith and lysten, gentylmen,
 That of myrthe loveth to here :
 Two of them were single men,
 The third had a wedded fere.
 Wylliam was the wedded man,
 Muche more than was hys care :
 He sayde to hys brethren upon a day,
 To Carleil he wold fare ;
 For to speke with fayre Alyce his wife,
 And with hys children thre.
 By my trouth, sayde Adam Bel,
 Not by the counsell of me :
 For if ye go to Carleil, brother,
 And from thys wylde wode wende,
 If the justice may you take,
 Your lyfe were at an ende.
 If that I come not to-morrow, brother,
 By pryme to you agayne,
 Truste not els but that I am take,
 Or else that I am slayne.
 He took his leave of his brethren two,
 And to Carleil he is gon :
 Theyre he knocked at his owne windowe,
 Shortly and anone,
 Wher be you, fayre Alyce my wyfe,
 And my chyldren thre ?
 Lyghtly let in thine owne husbände,
 Wylliam of Cloudeslè.
 Alas ! then sayde fayre Alyce,
 And syghed wonderous sore,
 Thys place hath ben besette for you
 Thys halfe yere and more.
 Now am I here, said Cloudeslè,
 I wold that in I were :
 Now fetche us meate and drynke ynoughe,
 And let us make good chere.
 She fetched hym meate and drynke plentyè,
 Lyke a true wedded wyfe :
 And pleased hym with that she had,
 Whome she loved as her lyfe.

There lay an old wyfe in that place,
 A lytle besyde the fyre,
 Whych Wylliam had found of charytyè
 More than seven yere.
 Up she rose, and forth she goes,
 Evel mote she spede therefoore ;
 For she had not set no fote on ground
 In seven yere before.
 She went unto the justice-hall,
 As fast as she could hye :
 Thys night is come unto thys town
 Wylliam of Cloudeslyè.
 Thereof the justice was full fayne,
 And so was the sherife also :
 Thoushalt not trauaill hither, dame, for nought,
 Thy mede thou shalt have or thou go.
 They gave to her a ryght good goune
 Of scarlate and of graine :
 She toke the gyfte, and home she wente,
 And couched her downe agayne.
 They rysed the towne of mery Carleile
 In all the haste they can ;
 And came thronging to Wylliames house,
 As fast as they might gone.
 Theyre they besette that good yemàn
 About on every side :
 Wylliam hearde great noyse of folkes,
 That theytherward they hyed.
 Alyce opened a back wyndow,
 And loked all aboute :
 She was ware of the justice and shirife bothe,
 Wyth a full great route.
 Alas ! treason, cryed Alyce,
 Ever wo may thou be !
 Goe into my chamber, husband, she sayd,
 Sweet Wylliam of Cloudeslè.
 He toke hys sweard and hys bucler,
 Hys bow and hys chyldren thre,
 And wente into hys strongest chamber,
 Where he thought surest to be.
 Fayre Alyce, lik a lover true,
 Took a pollaxe in her hande :
 He shal be dead that here commeth in
 Thys dore, whyle I may stand.
 Cloudeslè bente a wel-good bowe,
 That was of trusty tre :
 He smot the justice on the brest,
 That hys arowe brest in three.
 A curse on his harte, said William,
 Thys day thy cote dyd on !
 If it had ben no better than myne,
 It had gone nere thy bone.
 Yeld the, Cloudeslè, sayd the justise,
 Thy bowe and thy arrowes the fro.
 A curse on hys hart, said fair Alyce,
 That my husband concelleth so.

* Clym of the Clough, means Clem. (Clement) of the Valley ; for so Clough signifies in the North-

Set fyre on the house, saide the sherife,
 Syth it wyll no better be,
 And brenne we therein William, he saide,
 Hys wyfe and chyldren thre.
 They fyred the house in many a place;
 The fyre flew up on hye:
 Alas! then cryed fair Alyce,
 I se we here shall dy.
 William openyd a back wyndow,
 That was in hys chamber hie,
 And wyth shetes let downe his wyfe,
 And eke hys chyldren thre.
 Have here my treasure, sayde William,
 My wyfe and my chyldren thre:
 For Christes love do them no harme,
 But wreke you all on me.
 Wylliam shot so wonderous well,
 Tyll hys arrowes were all agoe,
 And the fyre so fast upon hym fell,
 That hys bowstryng brent in two.
 The sparkles brent and fell upon
 Good Wylliam of Cloudesle:
 Then he was a wofull man, and sayde,
 Thys is a cowardes death to me.
 Lever had I, sayde Wylliam,
 With my sworde in the route to renne,
 Then here among myne enemyes wode
 Thus cruelly to bren.
 He toke hys sweard and hys buckler,
 And among them all he ran.
 Where the people were most in prece,
 He smote down many a man.
 There myght no man abyde his stroke,
 So fersly on them he ran:
 Then they threw wyndowes and dores on him,
 And so toke that good yeman.
 There they hym bounde both hande and fote,
 And in depe dongeon cast.
 Now, Cloudesle, sayd the hye justice,
 Thou shalt be hanged in hast.
 A payre of new gallowes, sayd the sherife,
 Now shall I for the make;
 And the gates of Carleil shal be shutte,
 No man shall come in thereat.
 Then shall not helpe Clym of the Cloughe,
 Nor yet shall Adam Bell,
 Though they come with a thousand mo,
 Nor all the devels in hell.
 Early in the mornynge the justice uprose,
 To the gates first gan he gon,
 And commaundeth he to be shut full close
 Lightilè everychone.
 Then went he to the markett place,
 As fast as he could hye;
 A payre of new gallous there he set up
 Besyde the pyllorye.
 A lyttle boy among them asked,
 What meaneth that gallow-tree?
 They sayde, To hang a good yeaman,
 Called Wylliam of Cloudeslè.

That lytle boye was the towne swyne-heard,
 And kept fayre Alyces swine:
 Oft he had seene Cloudesle in the woode,
 And geuend hym there to dyne.
 He went out att a crevis in the wall,
 And lightly to the wood dyde gone;
 There met he with these wightye yemen
 Shortly and anone.
 Alas! then sayde that lytle boye,
 Ye tary here all to longe;
 Cloudesle is taken, and dampned to death,
 All readye for to honge.
 Alas! then sayd good Adam Bell,
 That ever we see thys daye!
 He had better with us have taryed,
 So ofte as we dyd hym praye.
 He myght have dwellyd in grene forèste,
 Under the shadowes grene,
 And have kept both hym and us in reste,
 Out of trouble and teene.
 Adam bent a ryghte good bow,
 A great hart sone had he slayne:
 Take that, chylde, he sayde, to thy dynner,
 And bryng me myne arrowe agayne.
 Now go we hence, sayde these wightye yeomen,
 Tary we no lenger here;
 We shall hym borowe by God his grace,
 Though we bye it full dere.
 To Carleil wente these good yemen,
 In a merry mornynge of Maye.—
 Here is a Fyt* of Cloudeslye,
 And another is for to saye.

Part the Second.

And when they came to merry Carleil,
 And in the mornynge tyde,
 They founde the gates shut them untill
 About on every side.
 Alas! then sayd good Adam Bell,
 That ever we were made men!
 These gates be shut so wonderous wel,
 We may not come here in.
 Then bespake him Clym of the Clough,
 Wyth a wyle we wyl us in bryng:
 Let us saye we be messengers,
 Streight come nowe from our king.
 Adam sayd, I have a letter written,
 Now let us wysely werke,
 We wyl saye we have the knyges seals;
 I holde the porter no clerke.
 Then Adam Bell bete on the gate,
 With strokes great and strong;
 The porter herde such noyse therat,
 And to the gate he throng.
 Who is there nowe, sayde the porter,
 That maketh all thys dinne?
 We be towmessengers, sayde Clim of the Clough,
 Be come ryght from our kyng.
 We have a letter, sayde Adam Bel,
 To the justice we must it bryng:
 Let us in our message to do,
 That we were agayne to the kyng.

* Part.

Here cometh none in, sayd the porter,
 Be hym that dyed on a tre,
 Tyll a false thefe be hanged up
 Called Wylliam of Cloudeslè.

Then spake the good yeman Clym of the Clough,
 And swore by Mary fre:
 An if that we stande long without,
 Lyk a thefe honge thou shalt be.

Lo! here we have the kyngès seale:
 What, lurden, art thou wode?
 The porter went it had been so,
 And lyghtly dyd off hys hode.

Welcome be my lordes seale, he sayde;
 For that ye shall come in.
 He opened the gate full shortlye;
 An euyl openyng for him.

Now are we in, sayde Adam Bell,
 Therof we are full faine;
 But Christ he knowes, that harowed hell,
 How we shall com out agayne.

Had we the keys, sayd Clim of the Clough,
 Ryght wel then should we spede,
 Then might we come out wel ynough
 When we se tyme and nede.

They called the porter to counsell,
 And wrange hys necke in two,
 And cast him in a depe dongeon,
 And toke hys keys hym fro.

Now am I porter, sayd Adam Bell,
 Se, brother, the keys are here,
 The worst porter to merry Carleile
 They have had thys hundred yere.

And now wyll we our bowes bend,
 Into the towne wyll we go,
 For to delyuer our dere brother,
 That lyeth in care and wo.

Then they bent theyr good yewe bowes,
 And loked theyr stringes were sound,
 The markett place in mery Carleile
 They beset that stound.

And, as they loked them besyde,
 A pair of new galowes thei see,
 And the justice, with a quest of squyers,
 Had judged theyr fere to de:

And Cloudeslè himselte lay in a carte,
 Fast bound both fote and hand;
 And a stronge rope about hys necke,
 All readye for to hange.

The justice called to hym a ladde,
 Cloudeslès clothes should he have,
 To take the measure of that yeman,
 Therafter to make hys grave.

I have sene as great marveile, sayde Cloudesle,
 As betweyne thys and pryme,
 He that maketh thys grave for me
 Hymselfe may lye therin.

Thou speakest proudli, sayd the justice,
 I shall the hange with my hande.
 Full well herd this his bretheren two,
 There styll as they did stande.

Then Cloudeslè cast his eyen asyde,
 And saw hys brethren twaine
 At a corner of the market-place,
 Redy the justice for to slaine.

I se comfort, sayd Cloudesle,
 Yet hope I well to fare,
 If I might have my hands at wyll
 Ryght lytle wolde I care.

Then bespake good Adam Bell
 To Clym of the Clough so free:
 Brother, se ye marke the justice wel;
 Lo! yonder ye may him see:

And at the sherife shote I wyll
 Strongly wyth arrowe kene;
 A better shote in mery Carleile
 Thys seven yere was not sene.

They loosed their arrowes both at once,
 Of no man had thei dread;
 The one hyt the justice, the other the sheryfe,
 That both theyr sides gan blede.

All men voyded, that them stode nye,
 When the justice fell to the grounde,
 And the sheryf fell hym by;
 Eyther had his deathes wounde.

All the citizens fast gan flye,
 They durst no lenger abyde:
 There lyghtly they loosed Cloudeslè,
 Where he with ropes lay tyde.

Wylliam sterte to an officer of the towne,
 His axe fro hys hand he wronge,
 On eche syde he smote them downe,
 Hym thought he taryed to long.

Wylliam saide to his brethren two;
 Thys daye let us lyve and de;
 If ever you have nede as I have now,
 The same shall you finde by me.

They shot so well in that tyde,
 Theyr stringes were of silke ful sure,
 That they kept the stretes on every side;
 That batayle did long endure.

The fought together as brethren tru,
 Lyke hardy men and bolde,
 Many a man to the ground they thrue,
 And many a herte made colde.

But when their arrowes were all gon,
 Men preceed to them full fast,
 They drew their swordes then anone,
 And theyr bowes from them cast.

They wenten lyghtlye on theyr way,
 With swords and bucklers round:
 By that it was myd of the day,
 They made mani a wound.

There was many a nout-horne in Carleile
 blowen,
 And the belles backward did ryng,
 Many a woman sayde, Alas!
 And many theyr handes did wryng.

The mayre of Carleile forth was com,
 Wyth hym a full great route:
 These yemen dred him full sore,
 Of their lyves they stode in doute.

The mayre came armed a full great pace,
With a pollaxe in hys hande;
Many a strong man wyth him was,
There in that stowre to stande.

The mayre smot at Cloudeslè with his bil,
Hys bucler he brast in two,
Full many a yeman with great evyll,
Alas! they cryed for wo.

Keepe we the gates fast, they bad,
That these traytours thereout not go.

But al for nought was that the wrought,
For so faste they downe were layde,
Tyll they all thre, that so manfulli fought,
Were gotten without, abraide.

Have here your keys, sayd Adam Bel,
Myne office I here forsake,
And yf you do by my counsell,
A new porter do ye make.

He threw theyr keys at theyre heads,
And bade them well to thryve,
And all that letteth any good yeman
To com and comfort his wyfe.

Thus be these good yemen gon to the wod,
And lyghtly, as lefe on lynde;
The lough and be mery in theyre mode,
Theyr foes wer ferr behind.

And when they came to the old Englishe wode,
Under the trusty tre,

There they found bowes full good,
And arrowes full great plentyè.

So God me help, sayd Adam Bell,
And Clym of the Clough so fre,
I would we were in mery Carleile,
Before that fayre meynè.

They set them downe, and made good chere,
And eate and dranke full well.—

A Second Fyt of the wighty yeomen:
Another I wyll you tell.

Part the Third.

As they sat in Englyshe wood,
Under the green-wode tre,
They thought they heard a woman wepe,
But her they mought not se.

Sore then syghed the fayre Alyce:
That ever I sawe thys daye!
For nowe is my dere husband slayne:
Alas! and well-a-day!

Might I have spoke with his dere brethren,
Or with eyther of them twayne,
To shew them what him befell,
My heart were out of payne.

Cloudeslè walk'd a little beside,
Lookt under the green-wood linde,
He was ware of his wife, and children thre,
Full wo in harte and mynde.

Welcome, wyfe, then sayd Wylliam,
Under this trusti tre:

I wende yesterday, by sweete saynt John,
Thou shoulde me never have see.

“Now well is me that ye be here,
My harte is out of wo.”

Dame, he sayde, be mery and glad,
And thanke my brethren two.

Herof to speake, said Adam Bell,
Iwis it is no bote:
The meate that we must supp withall,
It runneth yet fast on fote.

Then went they downe into a launde,
These noble archares thre;
Eche of them slew a hart of greece,
The best that they could se.

Have here the best, Alyce my wyfe,
Sayde Wylliam of Cloudeslye;
By cause ye so bouldly stode by me,
When I was slayne full nye.

Then went they to theyr suppere
Wyth suche meate as they had;
And thanked God of their fortune,
They were both mery and glad.

And when thei had supped well,
Certain wythouten lease,
Cloudeslè sayd, We wyll to our kyng,
To get us a charter of peace.

Alyce shal be at our sojournyng,
In a nunnery here besyde;
My tow sons shall wyth her go,
And there they shall abyde.

Myne eldest son shall go wyth me;
For hym have you no care;
And he shall breng you worde agayn,
How that we all do fare.

Thus be these yemen to London gone,
As fast as they might he*,
Tyll they came to the kyng's pallace,
Where they would nedes be.

And whan they came to the kyngès courte,
Unto the pallace-gate,
Of no man wold they ask no leave,
But boldly went in therat.

The preceid prestly, went into the hall,
Of no man had they dreade:
The porter came after, and dyd them call,
And with them gan to chyde.

The usher sayde, Yemen, what would ye have?
I pray you tell to me:
You myght thus make offycers shent:
Good syrs, of whence be ye?

Syr, we be outlawes of the forest,
Certayne withouten lease:
And hether we be come to our kyng,
To get us a charter of peace.

And whan they came before the kyng,
As it was the lawe of the lande,
They kneled downe without lettyng,
And eche held up his hand.

The sayed, Lord, we beche the here,
That ye will graunt us grace:
For we have slayne your fat falow-dere
In many a sondry place.

What be your nams, then said our kyng,
Anone that you tell me?

They said, Adam Bell, Clim of the Clough,
And Wylliam of Cloudeslè.

* Hie, hasten.

Be ye those theves, then sayd our kyng,
 That men have tolde of to me?
 Here to God I make an avowe,
 Ye shall be hanged all thre.
 Ye shal be dead without mercy,
 As I am kynge of this lande.
 He commandeth his officers every one,
 Fast on them to lay hande.
 There they toke these good yemen,
 And arrested them all thre:
 So may I thryve, said Adam Bell,
 Thys game lyketh not me.
 But, good lorde, we beseche you now,
 That yee graunt us grace,
 Insomuche as frelè to you we comen,
 As frelè fro you to passe,
 With such weapons as we have here,
 Tyll we be out of your place;
 And yf we lyve this hundreth yere,
 We wyll aske you no grace.
 Ye speake proudly, sayd the kynge;
 Ye shall be hanged all thre.
 That were great pity, then said the quene,
 If any grace myght be.
 My lorde, when I came fyrst into this lande
 To be your wedded wyfe,
 The fyrst boone that I wold aske,
 Ye wold graunt it me belyfe:
 And I never asked none tyll now;
 Then, good lorde, graunt it me.
 Now ask it, madam, said the kynge,
 And graunted it shall be.
 Then, good my lord, I you beseche,
 These yemen graunt ye me.
 Madame, ye myght have asked a boone
 That should have been worth them all three.
 Ye myght have asked towres and townes,
 Parkes and forests plentè;
 But none soe pleasant to my pay, shee sayd;
 Nor none so lefe to me.
 Madame, sith it is your desire,
 Your asking graunted shal be;
 But I had lever have geven you
 Good market townes thre.
 The quene was a glad woman,
 And sayde, Lord, gramarcyè;
 I dare undertake for them
 That true men they shal be.
 But, good my lord, speke some mery word,
 That comfort they may se.
 I graunt you grace, then sayd our kyng,
 Washe, felos, and to meate go ye.
 They had not setten but a whyle
 Certayne without lesynge,
 There came messengers out of the north
 With letters to our kyng.
 And whan they came before the kynge,
 They knelt downe on theyr kne;
 Sayd, Lord, your officers grete you well,
 Of Carleile in the north cuntrè.

How fareth my justice, sayd the kyng,
 And my sherife also?
 Syr, they be slayne, without leasyng,
 And many an officer mo.
 Who hath them slayne? sayd the kyng:
 Anone thou tell to me.
 Adam Bell, and Clim of the Clough,
 And Wyllyam of Cloudeslè.
 Alas for rewth! then sayd our kynge,
 My hart is wonderous sore;
 I had lever than a thousande pounce,
 I had known of thys before;
 For I have graunted them grace,
 And that forthynketh me:
 But had I knowen all thys before,
 They had been hanged all thre.
 The kyng he opened the letter anone,
 Himselfe he read it thro',
 And founde how these outlawes had slaine
 Thre hundred men and mo:
 Fyrst the justice, and the sheryfe,
 And the mayre of Carleile towne;
 Of all the constables and catchipolles,
 Alyve were scant left one.
 The baylyes and the bedyls both,
 And the sergeaunte of the law,
 And forty fosters of the fe,
 These outlawes had yslaw.
 And broke his parks, and slayne his dere;
 Of all they chose the best;
 So perelous outlawes as they were,
 Walked not by easte or west.
 When the kyng this letter had red,
 In harte he syghed sore:
 Take up the tables anone, he bad,
 For I may eat no more.
 The kyng called hys best archars,
 To the buttes with him to go:
 I wyl see these felowes shote, he sayd,
 In the north have wrought this wo.
 The kynges bowmen busket them blyve,
 And the quenes archers also:
 So dyd these thre wyghtye yemen;
 With them they thought to go.
 There twise or thryse they shote about,
 For to assay theyr hande;
 There was no shote those yemen shot
 That any prycke* myght stand.
 Then spake Wyllyam of Cloudeslè
 By him that for me dyed,
 I hold him never no good archar,
 That shoteth at buttes so wyde.
 "At what a butte now wold ye shote,
 I pray thee tell to me?"
 At such a but, syr, he sayd,
 As men use in my countrè.
 Wyllyam went into a fyeld,
 With his two bretherène:
 There they set up two hasell roddes,
 Full twenty score betwene.

I hold him an archer, said Cloudeslè,
That yonder wand clevech in two.
Here is none suche, sayd the kyng,
Nor none that can so do.

I shall assaye, sir, sayd Cloudesly,
Or that I farther go.
Cloudesly with a bearyng arowe
Clave the wand in two.

Thou art the best archer, then said the king,
For sothe, that ever I see.
And yet for your love, sayd Wyllyam,
I wyll do more mastery.

I have a sonne is seven yeare olde,
He is to me full deare;
I wyll hym tye to a stake;
All shall se, that be here;

And lay an apple upon hys head,
And go syxe score hym fro,
And I my selfe with a broad aròw
Shall cleave the apple in two.

Now haste the, then said the king;
By hym that dyed on a tre,
But yf thou do not as thou hast sayde,
Hanged shalt thou be.

An thou touche his head or gowne,
In syght that men may se,
By all the sayntes that be in heaven,
I shall hange you all thre.

That I have promised, said Wyllyam,
That wyll I never forsake.
And there even before the kynge
In the earth he drove a stake:

And bound thereto his eldest sonne,
And bad hym stand styll thereat;
And turned the childe's face him fro,
Because he should not sterte.

An apple upon his head he set,
And then his bowe he bent;
Syxe score paces they were out mete,
And thether Cloudeslè went.

There he drew out a fayr brode arrowe,
Hys bowe was great and longe;
He set that arrowe in his bowe,
That was both styffe and stronge.

He prayed the people that wer there,
That they all still wold stand,
For he that shòteth for such a wager
Behoveth a stedfast hand.

Much people prayed for Cloudeslè,
That his lyfe saved myght be;
And whan he made him redy to shote,
There was many a weeping ee.

But Cloudeslè cleft the apple in twaine,
His sonne he did not nee.
Over Gods forebode, sayde the kynge,
That thou shold shote at me.

I geve thee eightene pence a day,
And my bowe shalt thou bere,
And over all the north countrè,
I make the chyfe rydèr.

And I thyrtene pence a day, said the quene,
By God and by my fay;
Come feche thy payment when thou wyllt,
No man shall say the nay.

Wyllyam, I make the a gentleman
Of clothyng, and of fe:
And thy two breathren, yemen of my chambre,
For they are so semely to se.

Your sonne, for he is tendre of age,
Of my wyne-seller he shall be:
And when he cometh to man's estate,
Shall better avaunced be.

And, Wyllyam, bring to me your wife,
Me longeth her sore to se;
She shall be my chefe gentlewoman,
To govern my nurserye.

The yemen thanketh them courteously:
To some bishop wyl we wend,
Of all the synnes that we have done,
To be assoyl'd at his hand.

So forth be gone these good yemen,
As fast as they might be;
And after came and dwelled with the kynge,
And dyed good men all three.

Thus endeth the lives of these good yemen,
God send them eternal blysse;
And all that with a hand-bowe shoteth,
That/of heaven they never mysse. Amen.

§ 106. Song. Willow, willow, willow.

It is from the following stanzas that Shakspeare has taken his song of the Willow in his Othello, A. 4. s. 3. though somewhat varied, and applied by him to a female character. He makes Desdemona introduce it in this pathetic and affecting manner:

"My mothèr had a maid call'd Barbarie;
She was in love; and he she lov'd forsook her,
And she prov'd mad. She had a song of Willow;
An old thing 'twas, but it express'd her fortune:
And she dyed singing it."

A POOR soule sat sighing under a sicamore tree,
O willow, willow, willow!
With his hand on his bosom, his head on his knee;

O willow, willow, willow!
O willow, willow, willow!
Sing, O the greene willow shall be my garland!
He sighed in his singing, and after each grone,
O willow, &c.

I am dead to all pleasure, my true-love is gone;
O willow, &c.

Sing, O the greene willow, &c.

My love is turned; untrue she doth prove:
O willow, &c.

She renders me nothing but hate for my love.
O willow, &c.

Sing, O the greene willow, &c.

O pittie me (cried he) ye lovers, each one;
O willow, &c.

Her heart's hard as marble, she rues not my mone.
O willow, &c.

Sing, O the greene willow, &c.

The cold streams ran by him, his eyes wept
 apace;
 O willow, &c.
 The salt tears fell from him, which drowned
 his face.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 The mute birds sat by him, made tame by his mones;
 O willow, &c.
 The salt tears fell from him, which softened
 the stones.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 Let nobody blame me, her scornes I do prove:
 O willow, &c.
 She was borne to be faire; I to die for her
 love.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 O that beauty should harbour a heart that's so hard!
 O willow, &c.
 My true love rejecting without all regard.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 Let Love no more boast him in palace or bower;
 O willow, &c.
 For women are trothles, and flote in an houre.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 But what helps complaining? In vain I complain:
 O willow, &c.
 I must patiently suffer her scorne and disdaine.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 Come, all you forsaken, and sit down by me;
 O willow, &c.
 He that plaines of his false love, mine's falser than she.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 The willow wreath weare I, since my love did fleet;
 O willow, &c.
 A garland for lovers forsaken most meete.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow shall be my garland!

Part the Second.

Lowe layd by my sorrow, begot by disdaine,
 O willow, willow, willow!
 Against her too cruell, still, still I complaine,
 O willow, willow, willow!
 O willow, willow, willow!
 Sing, O the greene willow shall be my garland!
 O love too injurious, to wound my poor heart!
 O willow, &c.
 To suffer the triumph, and joy in my smart,
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.

O willow, willow, willow! the willow garland,
 O willow, &c.
 A signe of her falsenesse, before me doth stand:
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 As here it doth bid to despaire and to dye,
 O willow, &c.
 So hang it, friends, ore me in grave where I lye.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 In grave where I rest mee, hang this to the view,
 O willow, &c.
 Of all that doe know her, to blaze her untrue.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 With these words engraven, as epitaph meet,
 O willow, &c.
 "Here lyes one drank poyson for potion most sweet."
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 Though she thus unkindly hath scorned my love,
 O willow, &c.
 And carelessly smiles at the sorrowes I prove:
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 I cannot against her unkindly exclaim,
 O willow, &c.
 Cause once well I lov'd her, and honour'd her name.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 The name of her sounded so sweet in mine eare,
 O willow, &c.
 It rais'd my heart lightly, the name of my deare.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 As then 'twas my comfort, it now is my grieve;
 O willow, &c.
 It now brings me anguish, then brought me
 reliefe.
 O willow, &c.
 Sing, O the greene willow, &c.
 Farewell, faire false-hearted: plaints end with my breath!
 O willow, willow, willow!
 Thou dost loath me, I love thee, though cause of my death.
 O willow, willow, willow!
 O willow, willow, willow!
 Sing, O the greene willow shall be my garland!

§ 107. Barbara Allen's Cruelty.

In Scarlet towne, where I was borne,
 There was a fair maid dwellin,
 Made every youth crye, Wel-awaye!
 Her name was Barbara Allen.
 All in the merrye month of Maye,
 When greene buds they were swellin,
 Young Jemmye Grove on his death-bed lay,
 For love of Barbara Allen,

He sent his man unto her then,
To the town where shee was dwellin;
You must come to my master deare,
Giff your name be Barbara Allen.

For death is printed on his face,
And ore his harte is stealin:
Then haste away to comfort him,
O lovely Barbara Allen.

Though death be printed on his face,
And ore his harte is stealin:
Yet little better shall he bee
For bonny Barbara Allen.

So slowly, slowly, she came up,
And slowly she came nye him;
And all she sayd, when there she came,
Young man, I think y're dying.

He turn'd his face unto her strait,
With deadly sorrow sighing;
O lovely maid, come pity mee,
Ime on my death-bed lying.

If on your death-bed you doe lye,
What needs the tale you are tellin?
I cannot keep you from your death;
Farewell, sayd Barbara Allen.

He turned his face unto the wall,
As deadly pangs he fell in:
Adieu. adieu! adieu to all!
Adieu to Barbara Allen!

As she was walking ore the fields,
She heard the bells a knellin;
And every stroke did seem to saye,
Unworthye Barbara Allen.

She turned her bodye round about,
And spied the corpse a coming;
Laye down, laye down the corps, she sayd,
That I may look upon him.

With skornful eye she looked downe,
Her cheek with laughter swellin;
Whilst all her friends cryed out amaine,
Unworthy Barbara Allen.

When he was dead, and laid in grave,
Her harte was struck with sorrowe.
O mother, mother, make my bed,
For I shall dye to-morrowe.

Hard-harted creature, him to slight,
Who loved me so dearlye:
O that I had been more kind to him,
When he was alive and neare me!

She, on her death-bed as she laye,
Beg'd to be buried by him;
And sore repented of the daye
That she did ere denye him.

Farewell, she said, ye virgins all,
And shun the fault I fell in;
Henceforth take warning by the fall
Of cruel Barbara Allen.

§ 108. The Frolicksome Duke, or the Tinker's good Fortune.

The following ballad is upon the same subject as the Induction to Shakspeare's Taming of the Shrew:

whether it may be thought to have suggested the hint to the dramatic poet, or is not rather of later date, the reader must determine.

The story is told of Philip the Good, Duke of Burgundy; and is thus related by an old English writer: "The said Duke, at the marriage of Eleonora, sister to the King of Portugall, at Bruges, in Flanders, which was solemnized in the deepe of winter; when as by reason of unseasonable weather he could neither hawke nor hunt, and was now tired with cards, dice, &c. and such other domestic sports, or to see ladies dance; with some of his courtiers, he would in the evening walke disguised all about the towne. It so fortun'd, as he was walking late one night, he found a country fellow dead drunke, snorting on a bulke; he caused his followers to bring him to his palace, and there stripping him of his old clothes, and attyring him after the court fashion, when he awakened, he and they were all ready to attend upon his excellency, and persua'de him that he was some great duke. The poor fellow, admiring how he came there, was served in state all day long: after supper, he saw them dance, heard musicke, and all the rest of those court-like pleasures: but late at night, when he was well tipp'd, and again faste asleepe, they put on his old robes, and so convey'd him to the place where they first found him. Now the fellow had not made them so good sport the day before, as he did now, when he returned to himself: all the jest was to see how he looked upon it. In conclusion, after some little admiration, the poor man told his friends he had seen a vision; constantly believed it; would not otherwise be persua'ded, and so the jest ended." Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, pt. 2. sect. 2. memb. 4. 2d ed. 1624, fol.

Now as fame does report, a young duke
keeps a court, [sport:
One that pleases his fancy with frolicksome
But among all the rest, here is one I protest,
Which will make you to smile when you hear
the true jest. [ground,
A poor tinker he found lying drunk on the
As secure in a sleep as if laid in a swound.
The duke said to his men, William, Richard,
and Ben,
Take him home to my palace, we'll sport with him then. [convey'd
O'er a horse he was laid, and with care soon
To the palace, although he was poorly arrayd:
Then they stript off his clothes, both his shirt,
shoes, and hose,
And they put him to bed for to take his repose.
Having pull'd off his shirt, which was all over dirt, [no great hurt:
They did give him clean Holland, which was
On a bed of soft down, like a lord of renown,
They did lay him to sleep the drink out of his crown.
In the morning when day, then admiring he lay,
For to see the rich chamber both gaudy and gay.
Now he lay something late, in his rich bed of state, [wait;
Till at last knights and squires they on him did
And the chamberlain bare then did likewise declare,
He desired to know what apparel he'd wear:
The poor tinker amaz'd, on the gentleman gaz'd,
And admired how he to his honor was rais'd.

Though he seem'd something mute, yet he chose a rich suit,
 Which he straitways put on without longer dispute; [eyed,
 With a star on each side, which the tinker oft
 And it seem'd for to swell him no little with pride; [wife?
 For he said to himself, Where is Joan my sweet
 Sure she never did see me so fine in her life.

From a convenient place the right duke his good grace
 Did observe his behaviour in every case.
 To a garden of state on the tinker they wait,
 Trumpets sounding before him; thought he,
 This is great: [view,
 Where an hour or two pleasant walks he did
 With commanders and squires in scarlet and blue.

A fine dinner was drest, both for him and his guests;
 He was plac'd at the table above all the rest,
 In a rich chair or bed, lined with fine crimson red,
 With a rich golden canopy over his head:
 As he sat at his meat the music play'd sweet,
 With the choicest of singing, his joys to complete.

While the tinker did dine, he had plenty of wine,
 Rich canary and sherry, and tent superfine.
 Like a right honest soul, faith, he took off his bowl,
 Till at last he began for to tumble and roll
 From his chair to the floor, where he sleeping did snore,
 Being seven times drunker than ever before.

Then the duke did ordaine, they should strip
 him amain,
 And restore him his old leather garments again:
 'Twas a point next the worst, yet perform it
 they must, [him at first;
 And they carried him straight where they found
 Then he slept all the night, as indeed well he might; [flight.
 But when he did waken his joys took their

For his glory to him so pleasant did seem,
 That he thought it to be but a mere golden dream; [he sought
 Till at length he was brought to the duke, where
 For a pardon, as fearing he'd set him at nought;
 But his highness he said, 'Thou 'rt a jolly bold
 blade,
 Such a frolic before I think never was play'd.

Then his highness bespoke him a new suit and
 cloke, [joke;
 Which he gave for the sake of this frolicksome Nay, and five hundred pound, with ten acres of ground: [round,
 Thou shalt never, said he, range the counteries
 Crying, Old brass to mend; for I'll be thy good friend,
 Nay, and Joan thy sweet wife shall my duchess attend.

Then the tinker replied, What! must Joan my sweet bride,
 Be a lady, in chariots of pleasure to ride?
 Must we have gold and land ev'ry day at command?
 Then I shall be a squire I well understand:
 Well, I thank your good grace, and your love
 I embrace;
 I was never before in so happy a case.

§ 109. Song. Death's final Conquest.

These fine moral stanzas were originally intended for a solemn funeral song in a play of James Shirley's intitled, The Contention of Ajax and Ulysses.
 Shirley flourished as a dramatic writer early in the reign of Charles I. but he outlived the Restoration.
 His death happened Oct. 23, 1666, æt. 72. It is said to have been a favourite song with King Charles II.

THE glories of our birth and state
 Are shadows, not substantial things;
 There is no armor against fate:
 Death lays his icy hands on kings:
 Sceptre and crown
 Must tumble down,
 And in the dust be equal made
 With the poor crooked sithe and spade.
 Some men with swords may reap the field,
 And plant fresh laurels where they kill;
 But their strong nerves at last must yield,
 They tame but one another still.
 Early or late
 They stoop to fate,
 And must give up their murmuring breath,
 When they, pale captives, creep to death.
 The garlands wither on your brow;
 Then boast no more your mighty deeds:
 Upon death's purple altar now
 See where the victor victim bleeds.
 All heads must come
 To the cold tomb:
 Only the actions of the just
 Smell sweet, and blossom, in the dust.

§ 110. Song. SMOLLETT.

To fix her, 'twere a task as vain
 To count the April drops of rain,
 To sow in Afric's barren soil,
 Or tempests hold within a toil.
 I know it, friend, she's light as air,
 False as the fowler's artful snare,
 Inconstant as the passing wind,
 As winter's dreary frost unkind.
 She's such a miser too in love,
 Its joys she'll neither share nor prove;
 Though hundreds of gallants await
 From her victorious eyes their fate.
 Blushing at such inglorious reign,
 I sometimes strive to break my chain;
 My reason summon to my aid,
 Resolve no more to be betray'd.

Ah, friend! 'tis but a short-liv'd trance,
 Dispell'd by one enchanting glance;
 She need but look, and I confess
 Those looks completely curse or bless.
 So soft, so elegant, so fair,
 Sure something more than human's there:
 I must submit, for strife is vain;
 'Twas destiny that forg'd the chain.

§ 111. Song. Gilderoy.

He was a famous robber, who lived about the middle of the 17th century; if we may credit the histories and story-books of highwaymen, which relate many improbable feats of him, as his robbing Cardinal Richelieu, Oliver Cromwell, &c. But these stories have probably no other authority than the records of Grubstreet.

GILDEROY was a bonnie boy,
 Had roses tull his shoone,
 His stockings were of silken soy,
 Wi' garters hanging doune:
 It was, I weene, a comelie sight,
 To see sae trim a boy;
 He was my joy and heart's delight,
 My handsome Gilderoy.
 Oh! sike tve charming een he had,
 A breath as sweet as rose;
 He never ware a Highland plaid,
 But costly silken clothes.
 He gain'd the luv'e of ladies gay,
 Nane eir tull him was coy,
 Ah! wae is mee! I mourn the day,
 For my dear Gilderoy.

My Gilderoy and I were born
 Baith in one toun together;
 We scant were seven years befor
 We gan to luv'e each other;
 Our daddies and our mammies thay
 Were fill'd wi' mickle joy,
 To think upon the bridal day
 'Twixt me and Gilderoy.

For Gilderoy, that luv'e of mine,
 Gude faith, I freely bought
 A wedding sark of Holland fine
 Wi' silken flowers wrought:
 And he gied me a wedding-ring,
 Which I receiv'd with joy,
 Nae lad nor lassie eir could sing
 Like me and Gilderoy.

Wi' mickle joy we spent our prime,
 Till we were baith sixteen,
 And aft we past the langsome time
 Among the leaves sae green:
 Aft on the banks we'd sit us thair,
 And sweetly kiss and toy;
 Wi' garlands gay wad deck my hair
 My handsome Gilderoy.

Oh! that he still had been content
 Wi' me to lead his life;
 But, ah! his manfu' heart was bent
 To stir in feats of strife!
 And he in many a venturous deed
 His courage bauld wad try;
 And now this gars mine heart to bleed
 For my dear Gilderoy.

And when of me his leave he tuik,
 The tears they wet mine ee;
 I gave tull him a parting luik,
 "My benison gang wi' thee!
 God speed thee weil, mine ain dear heart,
 For gane is all my joy;
 My heart is rent, sith we maun part,
 My handsome Gilderoy!"

My Gilderoy, baith far and near,
 Was fear'd in ev'ry toun,
 And bauldly bare away the gear
 Of many a lawland loun:
 Nane eir durst meet him man to man,
 He was sae brave a boy;
 At length wi' numbers he was tane,
 My winsome Gilderoy.

Wae worth the loun that made the laws,
 To hang a man for gear,
 To reave of life for ox or ass,
 For sheep, or horse, or mare:
 Had not their laws been made sae strick,
 I neir had lost my joy;
 Wi' sorrow neir had wat my cheek
 For my dear Gilderoy.

Giff Gilderoy had done amisse,
 He mought hae banisht been;
 Ah, what sair cruelty is this,
 To hang sike handsome men!
 To hang the flower o' Scottish land,
 Sae sweet and fair a boy;
 Nae lady had so white a hand
 As thee, my Gilderoy.

Of Gilderoy sae fraid they were,
 They bound him mickle strong,
 Tull Edenburrow they led him thair,
 And on a gallows hung:
 They hung him high aboon the rest,
 He was so trim a boy:
 Thair dyed the youth whom I lued best,
 My handsome Gilderoy.

Thus having yielded up his breath,
 I bare his corpse away;
 Wi' tears, that trickled for his death,
 I washt his comelye clay;
 And siker in a grave sae deep
 I laid the dear-lued boy,
 And now for evir maun I weep
 My winsome Gilderoy.

§ 112. Song. Bryan and Pereene, a West-Indian Ballad, founded on a real Fact that happened in the Island of St. Christopher's.
 GRAINGER.

THE north-east wind did briskly blow,
 The ship was safely moor'd;
 Young Bryan thought the boat's crew slow,
 And so leap'd overboard.

Pereene, the pride of Indian dames,
 His heart long held in thrall;
 And whoso his impatience blames,
 I wot, ne'er lov'd at all.

A long long year, one month and day,
 He dwelt on English land;
 Nor once in thought or deed would stray,
 Though ladies sought his hand.

For Bryan he was tall and strong,
 Right blythesome roll'd his een;
 Sweet was his voice whene'er he sung:
 He scant had twenty seen.

But who the countless charms can draw,
 That graced his mistress true?
 Such charms the old world seldom saw,
 Nor oft, I ween, the new:

Her raven hair plays round her neck,
 Like tendrils of the vine;
 Her cheeks red dewy rose-buds deck,
 Her eyes like diamonds shine.

Soon as his well-known ship she spied,
 She cast her weeds away;
 And to the palmy shore she hied,
 All in her best array.

In sea-green silk so neatly clad
 She there impatient stood;
 The crew with wonder saw the lad
 Repel the foaming flood.

Her hands a handkerchief display'd,
 Which he at parting gave;
 Well pleas'd the token he survey'd,
 And manlier beat the wave.

Her fair companions one and all
 Rejoicing crowd the strand;
 For now her lover swam in call,
 And almost touch'd the land.

Then through the white surf did she haste,
 To clasp her lovely swain;
 When, ah! a shark bit through his waist:
 His heart's blood dyed the main;

He shriek'd! his half sprang from the wave,
 Streaming with purple gore;
 And soon it found a living grave,
 And, ah! was seen no more.

Now haste, now haste, ye maids, I pray,
 Fetch water from the spring:
 She falls, she swoons, she dies away,
 And soon her knell they ring.

Now each May-morning round her tomb,
 Ye fair, fresh flowrets strew;
 So may your lovers scape his doom,
 Her helpless fate scape you!

§ 113. Song. Gentle river, gentle river: translated from the Spanish. PERCY.

Although the English are remarkable for the number and variety of their ancient ballads, and retain perhaps a greater fondness for these old simple rhapsodies of their ancestors than most other nations, they are not the only people who have distinguished themselves by compositions of this kind. The Spaniards have great multitudes of them, many of which are of the highest merit. They call them in their language Romances. Most of them relate to their conflicts with the Moors, and display a spirit of gallantry peculiar to that romantic people. The two following are specimens.

GENTLE river, gentle river,
 Lo, thy streams are stain'd with gore;
 Many a brave and noble captain
 Floats along thy willow'd shore.

All beside thy limpid waters,
 All beside thy sand so bright,
 Moorish chiefs, and Christian warriors,
 Join'd in fierce and mortal fight.

Lords and dukes, and noble princes,
 On thy fatal banks were slain:
 Fatal banks, that gave to slaughter
 All the pride and flow'r of Spain!

There the hero, brave Alonzo,
 Full of wounds and glory died;
 There the fearless Urdiales
 Fell a victim by his side.

Lo! where yonder Don Saavedra
 Through their squadrons slow retires;
 Proud Seville his native city,
 Proud Seville his worth admires.

Close behind, a renegado
 Loudly shouts, with taunting cry:
 Yield thee, yield thee, Don Saavedra!
 Dost thou from the battle fly?

Well I know thee, haughty Christian,
 Long I liv'd beneath thy roof;
 Oft I've in the lists of glory
 Seen thee win the prize of proof.

Well I know thy aged parents,
 Well thy blooming bride I know;
 Seven years I was thy captive,
 Seven years of pain and woe.

May our Prophet grant my wishes,
 Haughty chief, thou shalt be mine:
 Thou shalt drink that cup of sorrow
 Which I drank when I was thine.

Like a lion turns the warrior,
 Back he sends an angry glare:
 Whizzing came the Moorish javelin,
 Vainly whizzing through the air.

Back the hero full of fury
 Sent a deep and mortal wound:
 Instant sunk the renegado
 Mute and lifeless on the ground.

With a thousand Moors surrounded,
 Brave Saavedra stands at bay:
 Wearied out, but never daunted,
 Cold at length the warrior lay.

Near him fighting, great Alonzo
 Stout resists the paynim bands;
 From his slaughter'd steed dismounted,
 Firm intrench'd behind him stands.

Furious press the hostile squadron,
 Furious he repels their rage.
 Loss of blood at length enfeebles:
 Who can war with thousands wage?

Where yon rock the plain o'ershadows,
 Close beneath its foot retir'd,
 Fainting sunk the bleeding hero,
 And without a groan expir'd.

§ 114. Alcanzor and Zaida, a Moorish Tale:
imitated from the Spanish. PERCY.

SOFTLY blow the evening breezes,
Softly fall the dews of night;
Yonder walks the Moor Alcanzor,
Shunning ev'ry glare of light.
In yon palace lives fair Zaida,
Whom he loves with flame so pure:
Loveliest she of Moorish ladies,
He a young and noble Moor.
Waiting for th' appointed minute,
Oft he paces to and fro:
Stopping now, now moving forwards,
Sometimes quick, and sometimes slow.
Hope and fear alternate tease him,
Oft he sighs with heartfelt care.
See, fond youth, to yonder window
Softly steps the tim'rous fair.
Lovely seems the moon's fair lustre
To the lost benighted swain,
When all silvery bright she rises,
Gilding mountain, grove, and plain.
Lovely seems the sun's full glory
To the fainting seaman's eyes,
When, some horrid storm dispersing,
O'er the wave his radiance flies.
But a thousand times more lovely
To her longing lover's sight,
Steals half-seen the beauteous maiden
Through the glimmerings of the night.
Tip-toe stands the anxious lover,
Whispering forth a gentle sigh:
Alla * keep thee, lovely lady!
Tell me, am I doom'd to die?
Is it true, the dreadful story
Which thy damsel tells my page,
That, seduc'd by sordid riches,
Thou wilt sell thy bloom to age?
An old lord from Antiquera
Thy stern father brings along;
But canst thou, inconstant Zaida,
Thus consent my love to wrong?
If 'tis true, now plainly tell me,
Nor thus trifle with my woes;
Hide not then from me the secret
Which the world so clearly knows.
Deeply sigh'd the conscious maiden,
While the pearly tears descend;
Ah! my lord, too true the story;
Here our tender loves must end.
Our fond friendship is discover'd,
Well are known our mutual vows;
All my friends are full of fury;
Storms of passion shake the house.
Threats, reproaches, fears, surround me;
My stern father breaks my heart;
Alla knows how dear it costs me,
Gen'rous youth, from thee to part.
Ancient wounds of hostile fury
Long have rent our house and thine;
Why then did thy shining merit
Win this tender heart of mine?

Well thou know'st how dear I lov'd thee,
Spite of all their hateful pride,
Though I fear'd my haughty father
Ne'er would let me be thy bride.

Well thou know'st what cruel chidings
Oft I've from my mother borne,
What I've suffer'd here to meet thee
Still at eve and early morn.

I no longer may resist them;
All to force my hand combine;
And to-morrow to thy rival
This weak frame I must resign.

Yet think not thy faithful Zaida
Can survive so great a wrong;
Well my breaking heart assures me
That my woes will not be long.

Farewell then, my dear Alcanzor!
Farewell too my life with thee!
Take this scarf, a parting token;
When thou wear'st it, think on me.

Soon, lov'd youth, some worthier maiden
Shall reward thy gen'rous truth;
Sometimes tell her how thy Zaida
Died for thee in prime of youth.

To him, all amaz'd, confounded,
Thus she did her woes impart;
Deep he sigh'd; then cried, O Zaida,
Do not, do not break my heart!

Canst thou think I thus will lose thee?
Canst thou hold my love so small?
No; a thousand times I'll perish!
My curst rival too shall fall.

Canst thou, wilt thou, yield thus to them?
O break forth, and fly to me!
This fond heart shall bleed to save thee,
These fond arms shall shelter thee.

'Tis in vain, in vain, Alcanzor;
Spies surround me, bars secure:
Scarce I steal this last dear moment,
While my damsel keeps the door.

Hark, I hear my father storming!
Hark, I hear my mother chide!
I must go; farewell for ever!
Gracious Alla be thy guide!

§ 115. King Edward IV. and the Tanner of Tamworth.

IN summer time when leaves grow greene,
And blossoms bedecke the tree,
King Edward wolde a hunting ryde,
Somme pastime for to see.

With hawke and hounde he made him bowne,
With horne, and eke with bowe;
To Drayton Basset he took his waye,
With all his lordes arowe.

And he had ridden ore dale and downe
By eight o'clocke in the day,
When he was ware of a bold tannèr,
Come ryding along the waye.

* Alla is the Mahometan name of God.

A fayre russet coat the tanner had on Fast buttoned under his chin;
And under him a good cow-hide,
And a mare of four shilling.

Nowe stand you still, my good lordes all,
Under the greene wood spraye,
And I will wende to yonder fellowe,
To weet what he will saye.

God speede, God speede thee, said our king.
Thou art welcome, sir, sayde hee.
The readiest waye to Drayton Basset
I praye thee to shewe to mee.

To Drayton Basset wouldst thou goe,
Fro the place where thou dost stand,
The next payre of gallows thou comest unto,
Turn in upon thy right hand.

That is an unready waye, sayd the king,
Thou doest but jest, I see:
Now shewe me out the nearest waye,
And I pray thee wend with mee.

Awaye with a vengeance! quoth the tanner,
I hold thee out of thy witt:
All daye have I ridden on Brocke my mare,
And I am fasting yett.

Go with me downe to Drayton Basset,
No daynties we will spare:
All daye shalt thou eate and drink of the best,
And I will paye thy fare.

Gramercye for nothing, the tanner replyde,
Thou payest no fare of mine:
I trow I've more nobles in my purse,
Than thou hast pence in thine.

God give thee joy of them, sayd the king,
And send them well to priefe.
The tanner wolde faine have been away,
For he weende he had beene a thiefe.

What art thou, he sayde, thou fine fellowe?
Of thee I'm in greate feare;
For the cloathes thou wearest upon thy backe
Might beseme a lord to weare.

I never stole them, quoth our king,
I tell you, sir, by the roode.
Then thou playest as many an unthrift doth,
And standeth in midds of thy goode.

What tydings heare you, sayd the kynge,
As you ryde far and neare?
I hear no tydings, sir, by the masse,
But that cow-hides are deare.

Cowe-hides! cowe-hides! what things are those?

I marvell what they bee?
What, art thou a foole? the tanner reply'd;
I carry one under mee.

What craftsman art thou? said the king;
I pray thee tell me trowe.
I am a barker*, sir, by trade;
Now tell me what art thou?

I am a poore courtier, sir, quoth he,
That am forth of service worne;
And fain I wolde thy prentise bee,
Thy cunninge for to learne.

Marrye, heaven forfend, the tanner replyde,
That thou my prentise were:
Thou woldst spend more good than I shold winn,
By fortye shilling a yere.

Yet one thinge wold I, sayd our king,
If thou wilt not seeme strange;
Thoughe my horse be better than thy mare,
Yet with thee I faine wold change.

Why if with me thou faine wilt change,
As change full well maye wee,
By the faith of my bodye, thou proude fellowe,
I will have some boot of thee.

That were against reason, sayd the king,
I sweare, so mote I thee:
My horse is better than thy mare,
And that thou well mayst see.

Yea, sir, but Brocke is gentle and mild,
And softly she will fare:
Thy horse is unrulye and wild, I wiss;
Aye skipping here and theare.

What boote wilt thou have? our king replied;
Now tell me in this stounde.
Noe pence, nor half-pence, by my faye,
But a noble in gold so rounde.

Here's twenty groates of white moneye,
Sith thou wilt have it of mee.
I would have sworne now, quoth the tanner,
Thou hadst not had one pennie.

But since we two have made a change,
A change we must abide;
Although thou hast gotten Brocke my mare,
Thou gettest not my cowe-hide.
I will not have it, sayde the kynge,
I sweare, so mote I thee;
Thy foule cowe-hide I would not beare,
If thou woldst give it mee.

The tanner he took his good cowe-hide,
That of the cowe was hilt;
And threwe it upon the king's saddelle,
That was so fayrely gilte.

Now help me up, thou fine fellowe,
'Tis time that I were gone:
When I come home to Gyllian my wife,
She'll say I'm a gentilmon.

The kinge he took him by the legge;
The tanner a f*** let fall.
Now marrye, good fellowe, said the kinge,
Thy courtesye is but small.

When the tanner he was in the king's saddelle,
And his foote in the stirrup was,
He marvelled greatlye in his minde,
Whether it were golde or brass.

But when his steede saw the cows-taile wagge,
And eke the black cowe-horne,
He stamped, and stared, and awaye he ranne,
As the devill had him borne.

The tanner he pull'd, the tanner he sweat,
And held by the pummil fast;
At length the tanner came tumbling downe:
His necke he had well-nye brast.

* Dealer in bark.

Take thy horse again with a vengeance, he sayd,
 With mee he shall not byde.—
 My horse would have borne thee well enoughe,
 Be he knewe not of thy cove-hide:
 Yet if againe thou faine woldst change,
 As change full well may wee,
 By the faith of thy bodye, thou jolly tanner,
 I will have some boote of thee.
 What boote wilt thou have, the tanner reply'd,
 Nowe tell me in this stounde?
 Noe pence, nor half-pence, sir, by my faye,
 But I will have twentye pounde.
 Here's twenty groates out of my purse;
 And twentye I have of thine:
 And I have one more, which we will spend Together at the Vine.
 The kinge set a bugle horne to his mouthe,
 And blewe bothe loude and shrille;
 And soone came lords, and soone came knights,
 Fast ryding over the hille.
 Nowe, out alas! the tanner he cryde,
 That ever I sawe this daye!
 Thou art a strong thefe, yon come thy fellowes
 Will beare my cove-hide away.
 They are no thieves, the king replyde,
 I sweare, so mote I thee:
 But they are the lords of the north countrey,
 Here come to hunt with mee.
 And soone before our king they came,
 And knelt downe on the grounde:
 Then might the tanner have beene awaye,
 He had lever than twentye pounde.
 A collar, a collar, here, sayd the kinge,
 A collar, he loud did crye.
 Then woulde he lever than twentye pounde
 He had not been so nighe.
 A collar, a collar, the tanner he sayd,
 I trowe it will breede sorrowe:
 After a collar comes a halter,
 And I shall be hanged to-morrowe.
 Away with thy feare, thou jolly tanner;
 For the sport thou hast shewn to mee,
 I wote noe halter thou shalt weare,
 But thou shalt have a knight's fee.
 For Plumpton parke I will give thee,
 With tenements faire beside,
 'Tis worth three hundred markes by the yeare,
 To maintain thy good cove-hide.
 Gramercye, my liege, the tanner replyde,
 For the favour thou hast me showne;
 If ever thou comest to merry Tamworth,
 Neates leather shall clout thy shoen.

§ 116. Lady Ann Bothwell's Lament. A Scottish Song.

The subject of this pathetic ballad is, A lady of quality, of the name of BOTHWELL, or rather BOSWELL, having been, together with her child, deserted by her husband, or lover, composed these affecting lines herself.

BALOW, my babe, ly stil and sleipe!
 It grieves me sair to see thee weipe;
 If thoust be silent, Ise be glad,
 Thy maining maks my heart ful sad.

Balow, my boy, thy mithers joy,
 Thy father breides me great annoy.
 Balow, my babe, ly stil and sleipe!
 It grieves me sair to see thee weipe.

When he began to court my luv,
 And with his sugred words to muve,
 His faynings fals, and flattering cheire,
 To me that time did not appeire:
 But now I see, most cruell hee
 Cares neither for my babe nor mee.

Balow, &c.

Ly stil, my darlinge, sleipe a while,
 And when thou wakest sweetly smile:
 But smile not, as thy father did,
 To cozen maids; nay, God forbid!
 But yette I feire, thou wilt gae neire,
 Thy fatheris hart and face to beire.

Balow, &c.

I cannae chuse, but ever will
 Be luvng to thy father stil:
 Whair-eir he gae, whair-eir he ryde,
 My love with him maun still abyde:
 In weil or wae, whair-eir he gae,
 Mine hart can neir depart him frae.

Balow, &c.

But doe not, doe not, prettie mine,
 To faynings fals thine hart incline:
 Be loyal to thy luvr trew,
 And nevir change hir for a new:
 If gude or faire, of hir have care,
 For womens banning's wonderous sair.

Balow, &c.

Bairne, sin thy cruel father is gane,
 Thy winsome smiles maun eise my paine:
 My babe and I'll together live,
 He'll comfort me when cares doe grieve:
 My babe and I right saft will ly,
 And quite forget man's cruelty.

Balow, &c.

Fareweil, fareweil, thou falsest youth,
 That ever kist a woman's mouth!
 I wish all maids be warn'd by mee,
 Nevir to trust man's curtesy;
 For if we doe bot chance to bow,
 They'll use us than they care not how.
 Balow, my babe, ly stil and sleipe!
 It grieves me sair to see thee weipe.

§ 117. Corydon's doleful Knell.

The burthen of the song, DING, DONG, &c. is at present appropriated to burlesque subjects, and therefore may excite only ludicrous ideas in a modern reader, but in the time of our poet it usually accompanied the most solemn and mournful strains.

My Phillida, adieu, love!
 For evermore farewell!
 Ay me! I've lost my true love,
 And thus I ring her knell.
 Ding dong, ding dong, ding dong,
 My Phillida is dead!
 I'll stick a branch of willow
 At my fair Phillis' head.

For my fair Phillida
 Our bridal bed was made:
 But 'stead of silkes so gay,
 She in her shroud is laid.

Ding, &c.

Her corpse shall be attended
 By maides in faire array,
 Till th' obsequies are ended,
 And she is wrapt in clay. Ding, &c.

Her herse it shall be carried
 By youths that do excel;
 And when that she is buried,
 I thus will ring her knell. Ding, &c.

A garland shall be framed
 By art and nature's skill,
 Of sundry-colour'd flowers,
 In token of good will* ; Ding, &c.

And sundry-colour'd ribbands
 On it I will bestow ;
 But chiefly blacke and yellowe
 With her to grave shall go. Ding, &c.

I'll deck her tomb with flowers,
 The rarest ever seen ;
 And with my tears, as showers,
 I'll keepe them fresh and green. Ding, &c.

Instead of fairest colours,
 Set forth with curious art†,
 Her image shall be painted
 On my distressed heart. Ding, &c.

And thereon shall be graven
 Her epitaph so faire,
 " Here lies the loveliest maiden
 " That e'er gave shepherd care." Ding, &c.

In sable will I mourne ;
 Blacke shall be all my weede :
 Ay me ! I am forlorne,
 Now Phillida is dead. Ding, &c.

§ 118. The old and young Courtier.

The subject of this excellent old song is a comparison between the manners of the old gentry as still subsisting in the times of Elizabeth, and the modern refinements affected by their sons in the reigns of her successors.

An old song made by an aged old pate,
 Of an old worshipful gentleman who had a great estate,
 That kept a brave old house at a bountiful rate,
 And an old porter to relieve the poor at his gate ;
 Like an old courtier of the queen's,
 And the queen's old courtier.
 With an old lady whose anger one word asswages ;
 They every quarter paid their old servants their wages,
 And never knew what belonged to coachman,
 footmen, nor pages, [badges ;
 But kept twenty old fellows with blue coats and
 Like an old courtier, &c.

With an old study fill'd full of learned old books,
 With an old reverend chaplain, you might know him by his looks,
 With an old buttery-hatch worn quite off the hooks, [zen old cooks ;
 And an old kitchen that maintain'd half a do-
 Like an old courtier, &c.

With an old hall, hung about with pikes, guns,
 and bows,
 With old swords, and bucklers, that had borne
 many shrewde blows,
 And an old frize coat, to cover his worship's
 trunk hose,
 And a cup of old sherry to comfort his copper
 Like an old courtier, &c. [nose,
 With a good old fashion, when Christmase was come,
 To call in all his old neighbours with bagpipe and drum, [room,
 With good cheer enough to furnish every old
 And old liquor able to make a cat speak, and man dumb ;
 Like an old courtier, &c.

With an old falconer, huntsman, and a kennel of hounds,
 That never hawked nor hunted but in his own grounds,
 Who, like a wise man, kept himself within his own bounds,
 And when he dyed gave every child a thousand good pounds ;
 Like an old courtier, &c.

But to his eldest son his house and land he assign'd, [tiffull mind,
 Charging him in his will to keep the old boun-
 To be good to his old tenants, and to his neighbours be kind :
 But in the ensuing ditty you shall hear how he was inclin'd,
 Like a young courtier of the king's,
 And the king's young courtier.

Like a flourishing young gallant, newly come to his land,
 Who keeps a brace of painted madams at his command,
 And takes up a thousand pound upon his father's land,
 And gets drunk in a tavern, till he can neither go nor stand !
 Like a young courtier, &c.

With a new-fangled lady, that is dainty, nice,
 and spare,
 Who never knew what belonged to good house-keeping, or care ;
 Who buys gaudy-colour'd fans to play with wanton air,
 And seven or eight different dressings of other women's hair ;
 Like a young courtier, &c.

With a new-fashion'd hall, built where the old one stood,
 Hung round with new pictures that do the poor no good,
 With a fine marble chimney, wherein burns
 neither coal nor wood,
 And a new smooth shovelboard, whereon no
 victuals e'er stood ;
 Like a young courtier, &c.

* It is a custom in many parts of England, to carry a fine garland before the corpse of a woman who dies unmarried.

† This alludes to the painted effigies of alabaster anciently erected upon tombs and monuments.

With a new study stuff full of pamphlets and plays, [prays,
 And a new chaplain, that swears faster than he
 With a new buttery-hatch that opens once in four or five days,
 And a new French cook to devise fine kick-
 shaws and toys ;

Like a young courtier, &c.

With a new fashion, when Christmas is drawing on,

On a new journey to London straight we all must be gone,

And leave none to keep house, but our new porter John,

Who relieves the poor with a thump on the back with a stone ;

Like a young courtier, &c.

With a new gentleman-usher, whose carriage is complete,

With a new coachman, footmen, and pages to carry up the meat,

With a waiting gentlewoman, whose dressing
 is very neat,

Who, when her lady has din'd, lets the servants not eat ;

Like a young courtier, &c.

With new titles of honor bought with his father's old gold,

For which sundry of his ancestors' old manors are sold ; [hold,

And this is the course most of our new gallants
 Which makes that good house-keeping is now grown so cold

Among the young courtiers of the king,
 Or the king's young courtiers.

§ 119. Loyalty confined.

This excellent old song is preserved in David Lloyd's
 "Memoires of those that suffered in the cause of Charles I." He speaks of it as the composition of a worthy personage, who suffered deeply in those times, and was still living, with no other reward than the conscience of having suffered. The author's name he has not mentioned ; but, if tradition
 may be credited, this song was written by Sir R.
 L'ESTRANGE.

BEAT on, proud billows ; Boréas, blow ;
 Swell, curled waves, high as Jove's roof ;

Your incivility doth show,
 That innocence is tempest-proof ;

Though surly Nereus frown, my thoughts are calm ;

Then strike, Affliction, for thy wounds are balm.

That which the world miscalls a jail,
 A private closet is to me :

Whilst a good conscience is my bail,
 And innocence my liberty ;

Locks, bars, and solitude, together met,
 Make me no prisoner, but an anchorite.

I, whilst I wish'd to be retir'd,

Into this private room was turn'd,
 As if their wisdoms had conspir'd

The salamander should be burn'd :
 Or like those sophists that would drown a fish,
 I am constrain'd to suffer what I wish.

The cynic loves his poverty ;

The pelican her wilderness ;

And 'tis the Indian's pride to be

Naked on frozen Caucasus :

Contentment cannot smart ; Stoics, we see,
 Make torments easie to their apathy.

These manicles upon my arm

I as my mistress' favours wear ;

And, for to keep my ancles warm,

I have some iron shackles there :

These walls are but my garrison ; this cell,
 Which men call jail, doth prove my citadel.

I'm in the cabinet lock'd up,

Like some high-prized margarite,

Or, like the great mogul or pope,

Am cloyster'd up from public sight :

Retiredness is a piece of majesty,

And thus, proud Sultan, I'm as great as thee.

Here sin for want of food must starve,

Where tempting objects are not seen ;

And these strong walls do only serve

To keep vice out, and keep me in :

Malice of late's grown charitable, sure ;

I'm not committed, but am kept secure.

So he that struck at Jason's life,

Thinking t' have made his purpose sure,

By a malicious friendly knife,

Did only wound him to a cure.

Malice, I see, wants wit ; for what is meant

Mischief, oftimes proves favour by th' event.

When once my prince affliction hath,

Prosperity doth treason seem ;

And to make smooth so rough a path,

I can learn patience from him :

Now not to suffer, shows no loyal heart ;

When kings want ease, subjects must bear a part.

What though I cannot see my king,

Neither in person or in coin ;

Yet contemplation is a thing

That renders what I have not mine :

My king from me what adamant can part,

Whom I do wear engraven on my heart !

Have you not seen the nightingale,

A prisoner like, coopt in a cage ;

How doth she chant her wonted tale

In that her narrow hermitage !

Even then her charming melody doth prove

That all her bars are trees, her cage a grove.

I am that bird, whom they combine

Thus to deprive of liberty ;

But though they do my corps confine,

Yet, maugre hate, my soul is free :

And though immur'd, yet can I chirp, and sing

Disgrace to rebels, glory to my king !

My soul is free as ambient air,

Although my baser part's immew'd,

Whilst loyal thoughts do still repair

T' accompany my solitude :

Although rebellion do my body binde,

My king alone can captivate my minde.

§ 120. To Althea from Prison.

This excellent Sonnet, which possessed a high degree of fame among the old Cavaliers, was written by Colonel Richard Lovelace during his confinement in the Gate-house, Westminster; to which he was committed by the House of Commons, in April 1642, for presenting a petition from the county of Kent, requesting them to restore the king to his rights, and to settle the government. See Wood's Athenæ, vol. ii. p. 228; where may be seen at large the affecting story of this elegant writer; who, after having been distinguished for every gallant and polite accomplishment, the pattern of his own sex, and the darling of the ladies, died in the lowest wretchedness, obscurity, and want, in 1658.

WHEN love with unconfined wings
Hovers within my gates,
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at my grates;
When I lye tangled in her haire,
And fetter'd with her eye,
The birds that wanton in the aire
Know no such libertie.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
With no allaying Thames,
Our carelesse heads with roses crown'd,
Our hearts with loyal flames;
When thirsty griefe in wine we steepe,
When healths and drafts goe free,
Fishes that tippie in the deepe,
Know no such libertie.

When, linnet-like, confined I
With shriller note shall sing
The mercye, sweetness, majesty,
And glories, of my king;
When I shall voyce aloud how good
He is, how great should be,
Th' enlarged windes that curle the flood
Know no such libertie.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron barres a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone, that soare above,
Enjoy such libertie.

Was written by William Hamilton of Bangour, Esq. who died March 25, 1754, aged 50.

A. BUSK ye, busk ye, my bonny bonny bride,
Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow,
Busk ye, busk ye, my bonny bonny bride,
And think no mair on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. Where gat ye that bonny bonny bride?
Where gat ye that winsome marrow?

A. I gat her where I dare na weil be seen,
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Weep not, weep not, my bonny bonny bride!
Weep not, weep not, my winsome marrow!
Nor let thy heart lament to leive
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. Why does she weep, thy bonny bonny bride?
Why does she weep, thy winsome marrow?
And why dare ye nae mair weil be seen
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow?

A. Lang maun she weep, lang maun she, maun
she weep,
Lang maun she weep with dule and sorrow;
And lang maun I nae mair weil be seen
Puing the birks on the Braes of Yarrow:

For she has tint her luer, luer dear,
Her luer dear, the cause of sorrow;
And I hae slain the comliest swain
That eir pu'd birks on the Braes of Yarrow.

Why rins thy stream, O Yarrow, Yarrow reid?
Why on thy braes heard the voice of sorrow?
And why yon melancholious weids
Hung on the bonny birks of Yarrow?

What's yonder floats on the rueful, rueful flude?

What's yonder floats? O dule and sorrow!
O 'tis he, the comely swain I slew
Upon the duleful Braes of Yarrow!

Wash, O wash his wounds, his wounds in tears,

His wounds in tears, with dule and sorrow;
And wrap his limbs in mourning weids,
And lay him on the Braes of Yarrow!

Then build, then build, ye sisters, sisters sad,
Ye sisters sad, his tomb with sorrow;
And weep around in waeful wise
His hapless fate on the Braes of Yarrow.

Curse ye, curse ye, his useless, useless shield,
My arm that wrought the deed of sorrow,
The fatal spear that pierc'd his breast,
His comely breast on the Braes of Yarrow.

Did I not warn thee, not to, not to lue?
And warn from fight? but, to my sorrow,
Too rashly bauld, a stronger arm
Thou mett'st, and fell'st on the Braes of Yarrow.

Sweet smells the birk, green grows, green
grows the grass,
Yellow on Yarrow's banks the gowan,
Fair hangs the apple frae the rock,
Sweet the wave of Yarrow flowan.

Flows Yarrow sweet? as sweet, as sweet flows Tweed,

As green its grass, its gowan as yellow;
As sweet smells on its braes the birk,
The apple frae its rock as mellow.

Fair was thy lue, fair, fair indeed thy lue,
In flow'ry bands thou didst him fetter;
Though he was fair, and well beluv'd again,
Than me he never lov'd thee better.

Busk ye, then busk, my bonny bonny bride,
Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow,
Busk ye, and lue me on the banks of Tweed,
And think nae mair on the Braes of Yarrow.

B. How can I busk a bonny bonny bride?
How can I busk a winsome marrow?
How lue him upon the banks of Tweed,
That slew my lue on the Braes of Yarrow?

O Yarrow fields, may never, never rain,
 Nor dew thy tender blossoms cover!
 For there was basely slain my luvè,
 My luvè, as he had not been a luvèr!
 The boy put on his robes, his robes of green,
 His purple vest, 'twas my awn sewing:
 Ah wretched me! I little, little kenn'd
 He was in these to meet his ruin.
 The boy took out his milk-white, milk-
 white steed,
 Unheedful of my dule and sorrow;
 But, ere the dewfall of the night,
 He lay a corpse on the Braes of Yarrow.
 Much I rejoic'd that waeful, waeful day;
 I sang, my voice the woods returning:
 But lang ere night the spear was flown,
 That slew my luvè, and left me mourning.
 What can my barbarous, barbarous father do,
 But with his cruel rage pursue me?
 My luvè's blood is on thy spear!
 How canst thou, barbarous man! then wooe me?
 My happy sisters may be, may be proud;
 With cruel and ungentle scoffin',
 May bid me seek on Yarrow's Braes
 My luvè nailed in his coffin:
 My brother Douglas may upbraid, upbraid,
 And strive with threatening words to muve
 me;
 My luvè's blood is on thy spear!
 How canst thou ever bid me luvè thee?
 Yes, yes, prepare the bed, the bed of luvè,
 With bridal sheets my body cuver:
 Unbar, ye bridal maids, the door,
 Let in the expected husbände luvèr.
 But who the expected husband, husband is?
 His hands, methinks, are bath'd in slaughter:
 Ah me! what ghastly spectre's yon
 Comes in his pale shroud, bleeding after?
 Pale as he is, here lay him, lay him down,
 O lay his cold head on my pillow;
 Take aff, take aff these bridal weids,
 And crown my careful head with willow.
 Pale though thou art, yet best, yet best beluv'd,
 O could my warmth to life restore thee!
 Yet lye all night between my briests,
 No youth lay ever there before thee.
 Pale, pale indeed! O lovely, lovely youth,
 Forgive, forgive so foul a slaughter,
 And lye all night between my briests,
 No youth shall ever lye there after.
 A. Return, return, O mournful mournful bride,
 Return, and dry thy useless sorrowe;
 Thy luvè heeds nought of thy sighs,
 He lies a corpse on the Braes of Yarrow.

§ 122. Childe Waters.

CHILD is frequently used by our old writers as a title.
 It is repeatedly given to Prince Arthur in the Faerie

Queene; and the son of a king is in the same poem called "Child Tristram." And it ought to be observed that the word child or child is still used in North Britain to denominate a man, commonly with some contemptuous character affixed to him,
 but sometimes to denote man in general.

CHILDE Waters in his stable stoode,
 And stroakt his milke-white steede:
 To him a fayre yonge ladye came
 As ever ware womans weede.
 Sayes, Christ you save! good Childe Waters,
 Sayes, Christ you save! and see,
 My girdle of gold, that was too longè,
 Is now too short for mee.
 And all is with one childe of yours,
 I feele sturre at my side:
 My gowne of greene it is too strait;
 Before it was too wide.
 If the childe be mine, faire Ellen, he sayd,
 Be mine, as you tell mee;
 Then take you Cheshire and Lancashire both,
 Take them your owne to bee.
 If the childe be mine, faire Ellen, he sayd,
 Be mine, as you doe sweare;
 Then take you Cheshire and Lancashire both,
 And make that childe your heyre.
 Shee sayes, I had rather have one kine,
 Childe Waters, of thy mouth;
 Than I wolde have Cheshire and Lancashire
 That lye by north and southe. [both,
 And I had rather have one twinkling,
 Childe Waters, of thine ee;
 Then I wolde have Cheshire and Lancashire
 To take them mine owne to bee. [both,
 To-morrow, Ellen, I must forth ryde
 Farr into the north countree;
 The fayrest ladye that I can finde,
 Ellen, must go with mee.
 Thoughe I am not that ladye fayre,
 Yet let me goe with thee:
 And ever, I pray you, Childe Waters,
 Your foot-page let me bee.
 If you will my foot-page bee, Ellèn,
 As you doe tell to mee;
 Then you must cut your gowne of greene
 An inch above your knee.
 Soe must you doe your yellowe lockes,
 An inch above your ee:
 You must tell no man what is my name;
 My foot-page then you shall bee.
 Shee, all the long daye Childe Waters rode,
 Ran barefoot by his syde;
 Yet was he never soe courteous a knightè,
 To say, Ellen will you ryde?
 Shee, all the long daye Childe Waters rode,
 Ran barefoote thorow the broome;
 Yet was he never soe courteous a knightè,
 To say, Put on your shoone.

Ride softlye, shee sayd, O Childe Waters,
Why doe you ride so fast?
The childe, which is no man's but thine,
My body itt will brast.

Hee sayth, Seest thou yond water, Ellen,
That flows from banke or brimme?—
I trust in God, O Childe Waters,
You never will see * me swimme!

But when shee came to the water syde,
She sayled to the chinne:
Nowe the Lorde of Heaven be my speede,
For I must learne to swimme!

The salt waters bare up her clothes;
Our Ladye bare up her chinne:
Childe Waters was a woe man, good Lord,
To see faire Ellen swimme!

And when shee over the water was,
Shee then came to his knee;
Hee sayd, Come hither, thou fayre Ellèn,
Loe yonder what I see!

Seest thou not yonder hall, Ellen?
Of red gold shines the yate:
Of twenty-four faire ladyes there,
The fairest is my mate.

Seest thou not yonder hall, Ellen?
Of red gold shines the towre:
There are twenty-four fayre ladyes there,
The fayrest is my paramoure.

I see the hall now, Childe Waters,
Of red gold shines the yate:
God give you good now of yourselfe,
And of your worthy mate.

I see the hall now, Childe Waters,
Of red gold shines the towre:
God give you good now of yourself,
And of your paramoure.

There twenty-four fayre ladyes were
A playing at the ball;
And Ellen, the fayrest ladye there,
Must bring his steed to the stall.

There twenty-four fayre ladyes were
A playinge at the chesse;
And Ellen, the fayrest ladye there,
Must bring his horse to gresse.

And then bespake Childe Waters sistèr,
These were the wordes sayd shee:
You have the prettyest page, brother,
That ever I did see.

But that his bellye it is soe bigge,
His girdle stands soe hye:
And ever, I pray you, Childe Waters,
Let him in my chamber lye.

It is not fit for a little foot-page,
That has run thro mosse and myre,
To lye in the chamber of any ladye
That wears so rich attyre.

It is more meete for a little foot-page,
That has run throughe mosse and myre,
To take his supper upon his knee,
And lye by the kitchen fyre.

Now when they had supped every one,
To bedd they tooke theyre waye:
He sayd, Come hither, my little foot-page,
And hearken what I saye:

Goe thee downe unto yonder towne,
And lowe into the streete;
The fayrest ladye that thou canst finde
Hyre, in mine armes to sleepe;
And take her up in thine armes twaine,
For filing † of her feete.

Ellen is gone into the towne,
And lowe into the streete;
The fayrest ladye that she colde finde,
She hyred in his armes to sleepe;
And took her up in her armes twayne,
For filing of her feete.

I pray you nowe, good Childe Waters,
Let me lye at your feete:
For there is noe place about this house
Where I may saye ‡ a sleepe.

He gave her leave, and faire Ellèn
Down at his beds feet laye:
This done, the night drove on apace;
And, when it was near the daye,

Hee sayd, Rise up, my little foot-page!
Give my steede corne and haye;
And give him nowe the good black oates,
To carry mee better awaye.

Up then rose the fayre Ellen,
And gave his steede corne and haye;
And soe shee did the good black oates,
To carry him better awaye.

She leaned her back to the manger side,
And grievouslye did groane:
Shee leaned her back to the manger side,
And there she made her moane.

And that beheard his mother deare,
She heard her woeful woe,
She sayd, Rise up, thou Childe Waters,
And into thy stable goe;

For in thy stable is a ghost,
That grievouslye doth grone:
Or else some woman laboures with childe,
She is so woe-begone.

Up then rose Childe Waters soone,
And did on his shirte of silke;
And then he put on his other clothes,
On his bodye as white as milke.

And when he came to the stable dore,
Full still there hee did stand,
That he might heare his fayre Ellen,
Howe shee made her monand §.

She sayd, Lullabye, mine owne deare childe,
Lullabye, deare childe, dear:
I wolde thy father were a kinge,
Thy mother layd on a biere!

* Permit, suffer.

† Defiling.

‡ Essay, attempt.

§ Moaning, bemoaning.

Peace nowe, hee sayd, good faire Ellen,
Bee of good cheere, I praye!
And the bridale and the churchinge bothe
Shall be upon one daye.

§ 123. The King and the Miller of Mansfield.

It has been a favourite subject with our English ballad-makers, to represent our kings conversing either by accident or design with the meanest of their subjects. Of the former kind, besides this song of the King and the Miller, we have King Henry and the Soldier; King James I. and the Tinker; K. William III. and the Forester, &c. Of the latter sort are K. Alfred and the Shepherd; K. Edward IV. and the Tanner; K. Henry VIII. and the Cobbler, &c.—This is a piece of great antiquity, being written before the time of Edward IV.; and for its genuine humour, diverting incidents, and faithful picture of rustic manners, is infinitely superior to all that have been since written in imitation of it.

Part the First.

HENRY, our royall king, would ride a hunting
To the greene forest so pleasant and faire,
To see the harts skipping, and dainty does tripping:

Unto merry Sherwood his nobles repaire;
Hawke and hound were unbound, all things
prepar'd

For the game, in the same, with good regard.

All a long summers day rode the king pleasantly,
With all his princes and nobles eche one;
Chasing the hart and hind, and the bucke gallantlie, [home.

Till the darke evening forced all to turne
Then, at last, riding fast, he had lost quite
All his lords in the wood, late in the night.

Wandering thus wearilye, all alone, up and downe,

With a rude miller he mett at the last:
Asking the ready way unto faire Nottingham:

Sir, quoth the miller, I mean not to jest,
Yet I think, what I thinke sooth for to say,
You doe not lightlye ride out of your way.

Why, what dost thou think of me, quoth our king merrily,

Passing thy judgment on me so brieve?
Good faith, said the miller, I mean not to flatter thee;

I guess thee to be but some gentleman thiefe;
Stand thee backe, in the darke; light not adowne,
Lest I presently cracke thy knaves crowne.

Thou dost abuse me much, quoth the king, say-
I am a gentleman; lodging I lacke. [ing thus;
Thou hast not, quoth the miller, one groat in thy purse;

All thy inheritance hanges on thy backe.
I have gold to discharge all that I call;
If it be forty pence, I will pay all.

If thou beest a true man, then quoth the miller,
I swear by my toll-dish I'll lodge thee all
night.

Here's my hand, quoth the king, that was I ever.
Nay, soft, quoth the miller, thou mayst be a
sprite.

Better I'll know thee, ere hands we will shake;
With none but honest men hands will I take.

Thus they went all along unto the miller's house; [souse:

Where they were seething of puddings and
The miller first entered in, after him went the king,

Never came hee in soe smoakye a house.

Now, quoth he, let me see here what you are.
Quoth our king, Look your fill, and do not spare.

I like well thy countenance, thou hast an honest face; [lye.

With my son Richard this night thou shalt Quoth his wife, By my troth, it is a handsome
youth,

Yet its best, husband, to deal warilye.
Art thou no runaway, prythee, youth, tell?
Shew me thy passport, and all shal be well.

Then our king presentlye, making lowe courtesye

With his hatt in his hand, thus he did say:
I have no passport, nor never was servitor,

But a poor courtyer rode out of my way:
And for your kindness here offered to mee,
I will requite you in everye degree.

Then to the miller his wife whispered secretlye,
Saying, It seemeth this youth's of good kin,
Both by his apparel, and eke by his manners;
To turne him out, certainlye, were a great sin.
Yea, quoth hee, you may see, he hath some grace,
When he doth speake to his betters in place.

Well, quo' the miller's wife, young man, ye're
welcome here;

And, though I say it, well lodged shall be:
Fresh straw will I have laid on thy bed so brave,
And good brown hempen sheets likewise,
quoth shee.

Aye, quoth the good man, and when that is done, [sonne.

Thou shalt lye with no worse than our own

Nay, first, quoth Richard, goode-fellowe, tell me true,

Hast thou noe creepers within thy gay hose?
Or art thou not troubled with the scabbado?

I pray, quoth the king, what creatures are those?

Art thou not 'lowsy, nor scabby? quoth he:
If thou beest, surely thou lvest not with mee.

This caus'd the king suddenlye to laugh most
heartilye,

Till the tears trickled fast downe from his eyes.
Then to their supper were they set orderlye,

With hot bag-puddings, and good apple-pyes,
Nappy ale, good and stale, in a brown bowle,
Which did about the board merrily trowle.

Here, quoth the miller, good fellow, I drink
to thee,

And to all cuckolds, wherever they bee.
I pledge thee, quoth our king, and thanke thee
heartilye

For my good welcome in every degree:
And here, in like manner, I drink to thy sonne.
Do then, quoth Richard, and quicke let it come.

Wife, quoth the miller, fetch me forth Lightfoote,

And of his sweetnesse a little we'll taste.

A faire ven'son pastye brought she out presentlye. [waste :

Eate, quoth the miller, but, sir, make no Here's dainty Lightfoote! In faith, said the I never before eate so dainty a thing. [king,

I wis, quoth Richard, no dainty at all it is,

For we do eat of it everye day. [like to this?

In what place, sayd our king, may be bought

We never pay pennye for itt, by my fay :
From merry Sherwood we fetch it home here ;
Now and then we make bold with our king's deer.

Then I thinke, sayd our king, that it is venison.

Eche foole, quoth Richard, full well may know that :

Never are we without two or three in the roof,

Very well fleshed, and excellent fat :

But prythee, say nothing wherever thou goe ;

We would not for two pence the king should it knowe.

Doubt not, then sayd the king, my promised secrese :

The king shall never know more on't for me.

A cup of lambs-wool they dranke unto him

And to their beds they past presentlie. [then,

The nobles, next morning, went all up and downe,

For to seeke out the king in every towne.

At last, at the millers cott, soone they espy'd him out,

As he was mounting upon his faire steede ;

To whom they came presently, falling down on their knee ;

Which made the millers heart wofully bleede :
Shaking and quaking, before him he stood,
Thinking he should have been hang'd by the rood.

The king perceiving him fearfully trembling,

Drew forth his sword, but nothing he sed.

The miller downe did fall, crying before them all, [head :

Doubting the king would have cut off his

But he, his kind courtesy for to requite,

Gaye him great living, and dubb'd him a knight.

Part the Second.

WHENAS our royall king was come home from Nottingham,

And with his nobles at Westminster lay ;

Recounting the sports and pastimes they had

In this late progress along on the way ; [taken

Of them all, great and small, he did protest,

The miller of Mansfield's sport liked him best.

And now, my lords, quoth the king, I am determined,

Against St. George's next sumptuous feast,

That this old miller, our new-confirmed knight,

With his son Richard, shall here be my guest :

For, in this merriment, 'tis my desire

To talke with the jolly knight, and the young squire,

Whenas the noble lords sawe the kinges pleasantness,

They were right joyfull and glad in their hearts : [business,

A pursuivante there was sent straight on the

The which had oftentimes been in those parts.

When he came to the place where they did dwell,

His message orderlye then gan he tell.

God save your worshippe, then said the messenger,

And grant your ladye her owne hearts desire ;

And to your sonne Richard good fortune and happiness ;

That sweet, gentle, and gallant young squire!

Our king greets you well, and thus he doth say,

You must come to the court on St. Georges day.

Therefore, in any case, faile not to be in place.

I wis, quoth the miller, this is an odd jest :

What should we doe there? faith, I am halfe afraid. [least.

I doubt, quoth Richard, to be hang'd at the

Nay, quoth the messenger, you doe mistake ;

Our king he provides a great feast for your sake.

Then sayd the miller, By my troth, messenger,

Thou hast contented my worshippe full well.

Hold, here are three farthings, to quite thy gentleness

For these happy tydings which thou dost tell.

Let me see, heare thou mee ; tell to our king,

We'll wait on his mastership in everye thing.

The pursuivant smiled at their simplicitie,

And, making many leggs, tooke their reward ;

And his leave taking with great humilitie,

To the kings court againe he repair'd ;

Shewing unto his grace, merry and free,

The knightes most liberall gift and bountie.

When he was gone away, thus gan the miller say :

Here come expences and charges indeed !

Now must we needs be brave, tho' we spend all we have ;

For of new garments we have great need :

Of horses and serving-men we must have store,

With bridles and saddles, and twenty things more.

Tushe! sir John, quoth his wife, why should you frett or frown?

You shall ne'er be att no charges for mee ;

For I will turn and trim up my old russet gowne,

With every thing else as fine as may bee :

And on our mill-horses swift we will ride,

With pillowes and pannells as we shall provide.

In this most stately sort rode they unto the court,

Their jolly son Richard rode foremost of all ;

Who set up, for good hap, a cocks feather in his cap,

And so they jetted downe to the king's hall ;

The merry old miller with hands on his side ;

His wifelike maid Marian did mince at that tide.

The king and his nobles, that heard of their coming,

Meeting this gallant knight with his brave traine ; [lady ;

Welcome, sir knight, quoth he, with your gay

Good sir John Cockle, once welcome againe :

And soe is the squire, of courage so free.
Quoth Dicke, A bots on you! do you know me?
Quoth our king gentlie, How should I forget thee?

That wast my own bed-fellowe, well it I wot.
Yea, sir, quoth Richard, and by the same token,
Thou with thy farting didst make the bed hot.
Thou whoreson unhappy knave, then quoth the knight,

Speak cleanly to our king, or else go sh*t*.

The king and his courtiers laugh at this heartily,
While the king taketh them both by the hand;
With the court dames' and maids, like to the queen of spades,

The miller's wife did so orderly stand,
A milkmaids courtesye at every word;
And downe all the folkes were set to the board.

There the king royally, in princelye majestye,
Sate at his dinner with joy and delight;
When they had eaten well, then he to jesting fell,
And in a bowle of wine dranke to the knight:
Here's to you both, in wine, ale, and beer;
Thanking you heartilye for my good cheer.

Quoth sir John Cockle, I'll pledge you a pottle,
Were it the best ale in Nottinghamshire.
But then, said our king, now I think of a thing,
Some of your Lightfoot I would we had here.
Ho! ho! quoth Richard, full well I may say it,
'Tis knavery to eate it, and then to betray it.

Why art thou angry? quoth our king merrilye;
In faith, I take it now very unkind:
I thought thou wouldst pledge me in ale and wine heartily.

Quoth Dicke, You are like to stay till I have din'd:
You feed us with twatling dishes so small;
Zounds, a black pudding is better than all.

Aye, marry, quoth our king, that were a daintye thing,
Could a man get but one here for to eat.
With that Dick straight arose, and pluck'd one from his hose,
Which with heat of his breech gan for to sweate.

The king made a proffer to snatch it away.—
'Tis meat for your master, good sir, you must stay.
Thus in great merriment was the time wholly spent;

And then the ladyes prepared to dance:
Old sir John Cockle and Richard incontinent
Unto their places the king did advance:
Here with the ladyes such sport they did make,
The nobles with laughing did make their sides ake.

Many thanks for their pains did the king give them,
Asking young Richard then if he would wed:
Among these ladyes free, tell me which liketh thee?

Quoth he, Jugg Grumball, sir, with the red head:
She's my love, she's my life, her will I wed;
She hath sworn I shall have her maidenhead.

Then sir John Cockle the king called unto him,
And of merry Sherwood made him o'erseer;
And gave him out of hand three hundred pound yearlye;

Take heed now you steal no more of my deer;
And once a quarter let's here have your view;
And now, sir John Cockle, I bid you adieu.

§ 124. The Witches' Song.

From Ben Jonson's Masque of Queens, presented at Whitehall, Feb. 2, 1609.

It is true, this song of the Witches, falling from the learned pen of Ben Jonson, is rather an extract from the various incantations of classic antiquity, than a display of the opinions of our own vulgar. But let it be observed, that a parcel of learned wiseacres had just before busied themselves on this subject, with our British Solomon, James I., at their head; and these had so ransacked all writers, ancient and modern, and so blended and kneaded together the several superstitions of different times and nations, that those of genuine English growth could no longer be traced out and distinguished.

By good luck the whimsical belief of fairies and goblins could furnish no pretences for torturing our fellow-creatures, and therefore we have this handed down to us pure and unsophisticated.

1 Witch.

I HAVE beene all day looking after
A raven feeding upon a quarter;
And, soone as she turn'd her back to the south;
I snatch'd this morsell out of her mouth.

2 Witch.

I have beene gathering wolves haire,
The mad dogges foame, and adders eares;
The spurging of a dead man's eyes:
And all since the evening starre did rise.

3 Witch.

I last night lay all alone
O' the ground, to heare the mandrake grone;
And pluckt him up, though he grew full low;
And, as I had done, the cocke did crow.

4 Witch.

And I h' beene chusing out this scull,
From charnel houses that were full,
From private grots and publike pits:
And frighted a sexton out of his wits.

5 Witch.

Under a cradle I did creepe
By day, and when the childe was a-sleepe
At night, I suck'd the breath; and rose,
And pluck'd the nodding nurse by the nose.

6 Witch.

I had a dagger: what did I with that?
Killed an infant to have his fat:
A piper it got, at a church-ale:
I bade him again blow wind i' the taile.

7 Witch.

A murderer yonder was hung in chaines;
The sunne and the wind had shrunke his veines:
I bit off a sinew; I clipp'd his haire;
I brought off his ragges, that danc'd i' the ayre

8 Witch.

The scrich-owles egges, and the feathers blacke,
The bloud of the frogge, and the bone in his backe,
I have been getting; and made of his skin
A purset, to keep sir Cranion in.

9 Witch.

And I ha' been plucking (plants among)
Hemlock, henbane, adders tongue,
Night-shade, moone-wort, libbards bane;
And twise by the dogges was like to be tane.

10 Witch.

I from the jaws of a gardiner's bitch
Did snatch these bones, and then leap'd the ditch:
Yet went I back to the house againe,
Kill'd the blacke cat, and here is the braine.

11 Witch.

I went to the toade, breeds under the wall,
I charmed him out, and he came at my call;
I scratch'd out the eyes of the owle before;
I tore the batts wings: what would you have more?

Dame.

Yes: I have brought, to helpe your vows,
Horned poppie, cypresse boughes,
The fig-tree wild that grows on tombes,
And juice that from the larch-tree comes,
The basiliskes bloud, and the vipers skin;
And now our orgies let's begin.

§ 125. The Fairies Farewell.

This humorous old song fell from the hand of the witty
Dr. CORBET, afterwards bishop of Norwich, &c. In his Poetica Stromata it is called "A proper new Ballad, intituled, The Fairies Farewell, or God-a-mercy
Will: to be sung or whistled to the tune of the Meadow Brow, by the learned; by the unlearned, to the tune of Fortune."

FAREWELL, rewards and Fairies!

Good housewives now may say;

For now foule sluts in dairies

Doe fare as well as they;

And though they sweepe their hearths no less

Than mayds were wont to doe,

Yet who of late for cleanliness

Finds six-pence in her shoe?

Lament, lament, old abbies,

The fairies lost command!

They did but change priests babies,

But some have chang'd your land:

And all your children stoln from thence

Are now growne Puritanes,

Who live as changelings ever since,

For love of your demaines.

At morning and at evening both

You merry were and glad,

So little care of sleepe and sloth

These prettie ladies had.

When Tom came home from labour,

Or Ciss to milking rose,

Then merrily went their tabour,

And nimbly went their toes.

Witness those rings and roundelays

Of theirs, which yet remaine;

Were footed in queen Maries dayes

On many a grassy playne.

But since of late Elizabeth

And later James came in;

They never danc'd on any heath,

As when the time had been.

By which wee note the fairies

Were of the old profession;

Their songs were Ave Maries,

Their dances were procession.

But now, alas! they all are dead,

Or gone beyond the seas,

Or farther for religion fled,

Or else they take their ease.

A tell-tale in their company

They never could endure;

And whoso kept not secretly

Their mirth, was punish'd sure:

It was a just and Christian deed

To pinch such blacke and blue:

O how the common-welth doth need

Such justices as you!

Now they have left our quarters;

A Register they have,

Who can preserve their charters;

A man both wise and grave.

An hundred of their merry pranks

By one that I could name

Are kept in store; con twenty thanks

To William for the same.

To William Churne of Staffordshire,

Give laud and praises due,

Who every meale can mend your cheare

With tales both old and true;

To William all give audience,

And pray yee for his noddle;

For all the fairies evidence

Were lost, if it were addle.

§ 126. Unfading Beauty.

This little beautiful Sonnet is reprinted from a small volume of "Poems by THOMAS CAREW, Esq. one of the gentlemen of the privie-chamber, and sewer in ordinary to his majesty Charles I. Lond. 1640." This elegant, and almost forgotten writer, whose poems have been deservedly revived, died in the prime of his age, in 1639.

In the original follows a third stanza, which, not being of general application, nor of equal merit, I have ventured to omit.

HEE that loves a rosie cheeke,

Or corall lip admires,

Or from star-like eyes doth seek

Fuell to maintaine his fires;

As old time makes these decay,

So his flames must waste away.

But a smooth and stedfaste mind,

Gentle thoughts, and calm desires,

Hearts with equal love combin'd,

Kindle never-dying fires;

Where these are not, I despise

Lovely cheekes, or lips, or eyes.

§ 127. Song. The Sky-Lark. SHENSTONE.

Go, tuneful bird, that gladd'st the skies,
 To Daphne's window speed thy way;
 And there on quiv'ring pinions rise,
 And there thy vocal art display.

And if she deign thy notes to hear,
 And if she praise thy matin song,
 Tell her, the sounds that soothe her ear
 To Damon's native plains belong.

Tell her, in livelier plumes array'd,
 The bird from Indian groves may shine;
 But ask the lovely, partial maid,
 Where are his notes compar'd with thine?

Then bid her treat yon witless beau
 And all his flaunting race with scorn;
 And lend an ear to Damon's woe,
 Who sings her praise, and sings forlorn.

§ 128. The Hermit. BEATTIE.

At the close of the day, when the hamlet is still,
 And mortals the sweets of forgetfulness prove,
 When nought but the torrent is heard on the hill,
 And nought but the nightingale's song in the grove—

'Twas then, by the cave of the mountain reclin'd,
 A hermit his nightly complaint thus began:
 Though mournful his numbers, his soul was resign'd;
 He thought as a sage, though he felt as a man.

"Ah! why, thus abandon'd to darkness and woe,
 Why thus, lonely Philomel, flows thy sad
 strain?
 For spring shall return, and a lover bestow;
 And thy bosom no trace of misfortune retain.
 Yet, if pity inspire thee, O cease not thy lay!
 Mourn, sweetest companion! man calls thee
 to mourn:
 O soothe him whose pleasures, like thine, pass
 away!
 Full quickly they pass, but they never return!

"Now gliding remote on the verge of the sky,
 The moon, half extinct, a dim crescent displays;
 But lately I mark'd, when majestic on high
 She shone, and the planets were lost in her blaze.
 Roll on then, fair orb, and with gladness pursue
 The path that conducts thee to splendor again:
 But man's faded glory no change shall renew;
 Ah, fool! to exult in a glory so vain!

"'Tis night, and the landscape is lovely no more:
 I mourn; but, ye woodlands, I mourn not for you;
 For morn is approaching, your charms to restore,
 Perfum'd with fresh fragrance, and glitt'ring with dew.
 Nor yet for the ravage of winter I mourn;
 Kind Nature the embryo-blossom shall save:
 But when shall spring visit the mouldering urn?
 O when shall it dawn on the night of the grave?"

§ 129. A Pastoral Ballad. In Four Parts. SHENSTONE.

1. ABSENCE.

YE shepherds so cheerful and gay,
 Whose flocks never carelessly roam;
 Should Corydon's happen to stray,
 O call the poor wanderers home.

Allow me to muse and to sigh,
 Nor talk of the change that ye find;
 None, once, was so watchful as I:
 —I have left my dear Phillis behind.

Now I know what it is to have strove
 With the torture of doubt and desire;
 What it is to admire and to love,
 And to leave her we love and admire.

Ah, lead forth my flock in the morn,
 And the damps of each evening repel:
 Alas! I am faint and forlorn:
 —I have bade my dear Phillis farewell.

Since Phillis vouchsaf'd me a look,
 I never once dream'd of my vine:
 May I lose both my pipe and my crook,
 If I knew of a kid that was mine!

I priz'd every hour that went by,
 Beyond all that had pleas'd me before;
 But now they are pass'd, and I sigh,
 And I grieve that I priz'd them no more.

But why do I languish in vain?
 Why wander thus pensively here?
 O, why did I come from the plain,
 Where I fed on the smiles of my dear?

They tell me, my favorite maid,
 The pride of that valley, is flown;
 Alas! where with her I have stray'd,
 I could wander with pleasure alone.

When forc'd the fair nymph to forego,
 What anguish I felt at my heart!
 Yet I thought, but it might not be so,
 'Twas with pain when she saw me depart.

She gaz'd, as I slowly withdrew;
 My path I could hardly discern;
 So sweetly she bade me adieu,
 I thought that she bade me return.

The pilgrim that journeys all day
 To visit some far-distant shrine,
 If he bear but a relique away,
 Is happy, nor heard to repine.

Thus, widely remov'd from the fair,
 Where my vows, my devotion, I owe,
 Soft hope is the relique I bear,
 And my solace wherever I go.

2. HOPE.

My banks they are furnish'd with bees,
 Whose murmur invites one to sleep;
 My grottoes are shaded with trees,
 And my hills are white over with sheep.

I seldom have met with a loss,
 Such health do my fountains bestow;
 My fountains, all border'd with moss,
 Where the hare-bell and violet grow.

Not a pine in my grove is there seen,
 But with tendrils of woodbine is bound;
 Not a beech's more beautiful green,
 But a sweet-brier twines it around.
 Not my fields in the prime of the year
 More charms than my cattle unfold:
 Not a brook that is limpid and clear,
 But it glitters with fishes of gold.
 One would think she might like to retire
 To the bow'r I have labor'd to rear;
 Not a shrub that I heard her admire,
 But I hasted and planted it there.
 O how sudden the jessamine strove
 With the lilac to render it gay!
 Already it calls for my love,
 To prune the wild branches away.
 From the plains, from the woodlands, and groves,
 What strains of wild melody flow!
 How the nightingales warble their loves
 From thickets of roses that blow!
 And when her bright form shall appear,
 Each bird shall harmoniously join
 In a concert so soft and so clear,
 As—she may not be fond to resign.
 I have found out a gift for my fair,
 I have found where the wood-pigeons breed;
 But let me that plunder forbear,
 She will say 'twas a barbarous deed.
 For he ne'er could be true, she averr'd,
 Who could rob a poor bird of its young;
 And I lov'd her the more when I heard
 Such tenderness fall from her tongue.
 I have heard her with sweetness unfold
 How that pity was due to a dove,
 That it ever attended the bold;
 And she call'd it the sister of love.
 But her words such a pleasure convey,
 So much I her accents adore,
 Let her speak, and whatever she say,
 Methinks, I should love her the more.
 Can a bosom so gentle remain
 Unmov'd, when her Corydon sighs?
 Will a nymph that is fond of the plain,
 These plains and this valley despise?
 Dear regions of silence and shade!
 Soft scenes of contentment and ease!
 Where I could have pleasingly stray'd,
 If aught in her absence could please.
 But where does my Phillida stray?
 And where are her grots and her bowers?
 Are the groves and the valleys as gay,
 And the shepherds as gentle, as ours?
 The groves may perhaps be as fair,
 And the face of the valleys as fine;
 The swains may in manners compare,
 But their love is not equal to mine.

3. SOLICITUDE.

Why will you my passion reprove,
 Why term it a folly to grieve,
 Ere I show you the charms of my love?
 She is fairer than you can believe.

With her mien she enamours the brave;
 With her wit she engages the free;
 With her modesty pleases the grave;
 She is every way pleasing to me.
 O you that have been of her train,
 Come and join in my amorous lays!
 I could lay down my life for the swain
 That will sing but a song in her praise.
 When he sings, may the nymphs of the town
 Come trooping, and listen the while;
 Nay, on him let not Phillida frown;
 —But I cannot allow her to smile.
 For when Paridel tries in the dance
 Any favor with Phillis to find,
 O how, with one trivial glance,
 Might she ruin the peace of my mind!
 In ringlets he dresses his hair,
 And his crook is bestudded around;
 And his pipe—O may Phillis beware
 Of a magic there is in the sound!
 'Tis his with mock passion to glow;
 'Tis his in smooth tales to unfold,
 “How her face is as bright as the snow,
 And her bosom, be sure, is as cold;
 How the nightingales labor the strain,
 With the notes of his charmer to vie;
 How they vary their accents in vain,
 Repine at her triumphs, and die.”
 To the grove or the garden he strays,
 And pillages every sweet;
 Then, suiting the wreath to his lays,
 He throws it at Phillis's feet.
 “O Phillis,” he whispers, “more fair,
 More sweet, than the jessamine's flow'r!
 What are pinks in a morn, to compare?
 What is eglantine after a shower?”
 “Then the lily no longer is white;
 Then the rose is depriv'd of its bloom;
 Then the violets die with despite,
 And the woodbines give up their perfume.”
 Thus glide the soft numbers along,
 And he fancies no shepherd his peer;
 Yet I never should envy the song,
 Were not Phillis to lend it an ear.
 Let his crook be with hyacinths bound,
 So Phillis the trophy despise;
 Let his forehead with laurels be crown'd,
 So they shine not in Phillis's eyes.
 The language that flows from the heart
 Is a stranger to Paridel's tongue;
 Yet may she beware of his art!
 Or sure I must envy the song.

4. DISAPPOINTMENT.

Ye shepherds, give ear to my lay,
 And take no more heed of my sheep:
 They have nothing to do but to stray,
 I have nothing to do but to weep.
 Yet do not my folly reprove:
 She was fair, and my passion begun;
 She smil'd, and I could not but love;
 She is faithless, and I am undone.

Perhaps I was void of all thought;
 Perhaps it was plain to foresee,
 That a nymph so complete would be sought
 By a swain more engaging than me.
 Ah! love ev'ry hope can inspire:
 It banishes wisdom the while;
 And the lip of the nymph we admire
 Seems for ever adorn'd with a smile!

She is faithless, and I am undone;
 Ye that witness the woes I endure,
 Let reason instruct you to shun
 What it cannot instruct you to cure.
 Beware how you loiter in vain
 Amid nymphs of a higher degree:
 It is not for me to explain
 How fair and how fickle they be.

Alas! from the day that we met,
 What hope of an end to my woes,
 When I cannot endure to forget
 The glance that undid my repose?
 Yet time may diminish the pain:
 The flow'r, and the shrub, and the tree,
 Which I rear'd for her pleasure in vain,
 In time may have comfort for me.

The sweets of a dew-sprinkled rose,
 The sound of a murmuring stream,
 The peace which from solitude flows,
 Henceforth shall be Corydon's theme.
 High transports are shown to the sight,
 But we are not to find them our own:
 Fate never bestow'd such delight,
 As I with my Phillis had known.

O ye woods, spread your branches apace;
 To your deepest recesses I fly;
 I would hide with the beasts of the chase,
 I would vanish from every eye.
 Yet my reed shall resound through the grove
 With the same sad complaint it begun;
 How she smil'd, and I could not but love;
 Was faithless, and I am undone!

§ 130. Phœbe. A Pastoral. BYRON.

My time, O ye muses! was happily spent,
 When Phœbe went with me wherever I went:
 Ten thousand soft pleasures I felt in my breast:
 Sure never fond shepherd like Colin was blest.
 But now she is gone, and has left me behind,
 What a marvellous change on a sudden I find!
 When things were as fine as could possibly be,
 I thought it was spring; but alas! it was she.

The fountain that wont to run sweetly along,
 And dance to soft murmurs the pebbles among,
 Thou know'st, little Cupid, if Phœbe was there,
 It was pleasant to look at, 'twas music to hear!
 But now she is absent, I walk by its side,
 And, still as it murmurs, do nothing but chide:
 Must you be so cheerful, whilst I go in pain?
 Peace there with your bubbling, and hear me complain.

My dog I was ever well pleased to see
 Come wagging his tail to my fair one and me;

And Phœbe was pleas'd too, and to my dog said,
 "Come hither, poor fellow!" and patted his head: [look,
 But now, when he's fawning, I, with a sour Cry, "Sirrah!" and give him a blow with my crook:
 And I'll give him another; for why should not Tray
 Be dull as his master, when Phœbe's away?

Sweet music went with us both all the wood through, [too;
 The lark, linnet, throstle, and nightingale
 Winds over us whisper'd, flocks by us did bleat,
 And chirp went the grasshopper under our feet.
 But now she is absent, though still they sing on,
 The woods are but lonely, the melody's gone!
 Her voice in the concert, as now I have found,
 Gives every thing else its agreeable sound.

Will no pitying Power that hears me complain,
 Or cure my disquiet, or soften my pain?
 To be cur'd, thou must, Colin, thy passion remove,
 But what swain is so silly to live without love?
 No, deity, bid the dear nymph to return;
 For ne'er was poor shepherd so sadly forlorn.
 Ah! what shall I do? I shall die with despair:
 Take heed, all ye swains, how ye love one so fair.

§ 131. A Pastoral Ballad. ROWE.

DESPAIRING beside a clear stream,
 A shepherd forsaken was laid;
 And, while a false nymph was his theme,
 A willow supported his head.
 The wind that blew over the plain,
 To his sighs with a sigh did reply;
 And the brook, in return to his pain,
 Ran mournfully murmuring by.

Alas! silly swain that I was!
 (Thus sadly complaining, he cried;)
 When first I beheld that fair face,
 'Twere better by far I had died.
 She talk'd, and I bless'd her dear tongue;
 When she smil'd, it was pleasure too great;
 I listen'd, and cried, when she sung,
 Was nightingale ever so sweet!

How foolish was I to believe
 She could doat on so lowly a clown,
 Or that her fond heart would not grieve
 To forsake the fine folk of the town!
 To think that a beauty so gay
 So kind and so constant would prove;
 Or go clad, like our maidens, in grey,
 Or live in a cottage on love!

What though I have skill to complain,
 Though the muses my temples have crown'd;
 What though, when they hear my soft strain,
 The virgins sit weeping around;
 Ah, Colin! thy hopes are in vain,
 Thy pipe and thy laurel resign;
 Thy fair one inclines to a swain
 Whose music is sweeter than thine.

All you, my companions so dear,
 Who sorrow to see me betray'd,
 Whatever I suffer, forbear,
 Forbear to accuse the false maid.
 Though through the wide world I should range,
 'Tis in vain from my fortune to fly;
 'Twas hers to be false, and to change;
 'Tis mine to be constant, and die.
 If, while my hard fate I sustain,
 In her breast any pity is found;
 Let her come, with the nymphs of the plain,
 And see me laid low in the ground:
 The last humble boon that I crave
 Is, to shade me with cypress and yew;
 And, when she looks down on my grave,
 Let her own that her shepherd was true.
 Then to her new love let her go,
 And deck her in golden array;
 Be finest at ev'ry fine show,
 And frolic it all the long day:
 While Colin, forgotten and gone,
 No more shall be talk'd of or seen,
 Unless when, beneath the pale moon,
 His ghost shall glide over the green.

§ 132. A Fairy Tale. PARNELL.

IN Britain's isle, and Arthur's days,
 When midnight fairies daunc'd the maze,
 Liv'd Edwin of the Green;
 Edwin, I wis, a gentle youth,
 Endow'd with courage, sense, and truth,
 Though badly shap'd he been.

His mountain back mote well be said
 To measure height against his head,
 And lift itself above;
 Yet, spite of all that Nature did
 To make his uncouth form forbid,
 This creature dar'd to love.

He felt the charms of Edith's eyes,
 Nor wanted hope to gain the prize,
 Could ladies look within;
 But one Sir Topaz dress'd with art,
 And, if a shape could win a heart,
 He had a shape to win.

Edwin, if right I read my song,
 With slighted passion paced along
 All in the moony light;
 'Twas near an old enchanted court,
 Where sportive fairies made resort,
 To revel out the night.

His heart was drear, his hope was cross'd,
 'Twas late, 'twas far, the path was lost
 That reach'd the neighbour town:
 With weary steps he quits the shades,
 Resolv'd, the darkling dome he treads,
 And drops his limbs adown.

But scant he lays him on the floor,
 When hollow winds remove the door,
 A trembling rocks the ground:
 And, well I ween to count aright,
 At once an hundred tapers light
 On all the walls around.

Now sounding tongues assail his ear,
 Now sounding feet approachen near,

And now the sounds increase:
 And, from the corner where he lay,
 He sees a train, profusely gay,
 Come pranking o'er the place.
 But (trust me, gentles) never yet
 Was dight a masquing half so neat,
 Or half so rich, before;
 The country lent the sweet perfumes,
 The sea the pearl, the sky the plumes,
 The town its silken store.

Now, whilst he gaz'd, a gallant, drest
 In flaunting robes above the rest,
 With awful accent cried:
 "What mortal, of a wretched mind,
 Whose sighs infect the balmy wind,
 Has here presum'd to hide?"

At this the swain, whose vent'rous soul
 No fears of magic art control,
 Advanc'd in open sight;
 "Nor have I cause of dread," he said,
 "Who view, by no presumption led,
 Your revels of the night.

"'Twas grief, for scorn of faithful love,
 Which made my steps unweeting rove
 Amid the nightly dew."
 "'Tis well," the gallant cries again,
 "We fairies never injure men
 Who dare to tell us true.

"Exalt thy love-dejected heart;
 Be mine the task, or ere we part,
 To make thee grief resign;
 Now take the pleasure of thy chance;
 Whilst I with Mab, my partner, daunce,
 Be little Mable thine."

He spoke, and, all a sudden, there
 Light music floats in wanton air;
 The Monarch leads the Queen:
 The rest their fairie partners found:
 And Mable trimly tript the ground
 With Edwin of the Green.

The dauncing past, the board was laid,
 And siker such a feast was made
 As heart and lip desire:
 Withouten hands the dishes fly,
 The glasses with a wish come nigh,
 And with a wish retire.

But now, to please the fairie king,
 Full every deal they laugh and sing,
 And antic feats devise;
 Some wind and tumble like an ape,
 And other some transmute their shape,
 In Edwin's wond'ring eyes.

Till one, at last, that Robin hight,
 Renown'd for pinching maids at night,
 Has bent him up aloof;
 And full against the beam he flung,
 Where by the back the youth he hung,
 To sprawl unneath the roof.

From thence, "Reverse my charm," he cries,
 "And let it fairly now suffice,
 The gambol has been shown."
 But Oberon answers, with a smile,
 "Content thee, Edwin, for a while,
 The vantage is thine own."—

Here ended all the phantom-play ;
 They smelt the fresh approach of day,
 And heard a cock to crow ;
 The whirling wind, that bore the crowd
 Has clapp'd the door, and whistled loud,
 To warn them all to go.
 Then screaming all at once they fly,
 And all at once the tapers die ;
 Poor Edwin falls to floor :
 Forlorn his state, and dark the place,
 Was never wight in such a case
 Through all the land before !
 But, soon as dan Apollo rose,
 Full jolly creature home he goes !
 He feels his back the less ;
 His honest tongue and steady mind
 Had rid him of the lump behind,
 Which made him want success :
 With lusty livelyhed he talks,
 He seems a-dauncing as he walks ;
 His story soon took wind ;
 And beauteous Edith sees the youth
 Endow'd with courage, sense, and truth,
 Without a bunch behind !
 The story told, Sir Topaz mov'd,
 (The youth of Edith erst approv'd)
 To see the revel scene :
 At close of eve he leaves his home,
 And wends to find the ruin'd dome
 All on the gloomy plain.
 As there he bides, it so befel,
 The wind came rustling down a dell,
 A shaking seiz'd the wall :
 Up sprung the tapers, as before,
 The fairies bragly foot the floor,
 And music fills the hall.
 But, certes, sorely sunk with woe
 Sir Topaz sees the elfin show,
 His spirits in him die ;
 When Oberon cries, " A man is near ;
 A mortal passion, cleped fear,
 Hangs flagging in the sky."
 With that sir Topaz, hapless youth !
 In accents falt'ring aye for ruth,
 Intreats them pity graunt ;
 For als he been a mister wight
 Betray'd by wand'ring in the night
 To tread the circling haunt.
 " Ah, losel vile !" at once they roar,
 " And little skill'd of fairie lore,
 Thy cause to come we know :
 Now has thy kestrell courage fell ;
 And fairies, since a lye you tell,
 Are free to work thee woe."
 Then Will who bears the wispy fire
 To trail the swains among the mire,
 The captive upward flung ;
 There, like a tortoise in a shop,
 He dangled from the chamber-top,
 Where whilom Edwin hung.
 The revel now proceeds apace,
 Deftly they frisk it o'er the place,
 They sit, they drink, and eat ;
 The time with frolic mirth beguile,
 And poor sir Topaz hangs the while,
 Till all the rout retreat.

By this the stars began to wink ;
 They shriek, they fly, the tapers sink,
 And down ydrops the knight :
 For never spell by fairie laid
 With strong enchantment, bound a glade
 Beyond the length of night.
 Chill, dark, alone, adreed he lay,
 Till up the welkin rose the day,
 Then deem'd the dole was o'er :
 But wot ye well his harder lot ;
 His seely back the bunch had got
 Which Edwin lost afore.—
 This tale a Sybil nurse ared ;
 She softly stroak'd my youngling head,
 And when the tale was done :
 " Thus some are born, my son," she cries,
 " With base impediments to rise,
 And some are born with none.
 But virtue can itself advance
 To what the fav'rite fools of chance
 By fortune seem'd design'd ;
 Virtue can gain the odds of fate,
 And from itself shake off the weight
 Upon th' unworthy mind."

§ 133. Song. THOMSON.

FOR ever, Fortune ! wilt thou prove
 An unrelenting foe to love,
 And when we meet a mutual heart,
 Come in between, and bid us part ;
 Bid us sigh on from day to day,
 And wish, and wish the soul away,
 Till youth and genial years are flown,
 And all the life of love is gone ?
 But busy, busy, still art thou,
 To bind the loveless, joyless vow,
 The heart from pleasure to delude,
 To join the gentle to the rude.
 For once, O Fortune ! hear my prayer,
 And I absolve thy future care ;
 All other blessings I resign,
 Make but the dear Amanda mine.

§ 134. The Barber's Nuptials.

IN Liquorpond-street, as is well known to many,
 An artist resided, who shav'd for a penny,
 Cut hair for three halfpence, for three-pence
 he bled,
 And would draw for a groat every tooth in your
 head.
 What annoy'd other folks never spoil'd his repose,
 'Twas the same thing to him whether stocks fell or rose :
 For blast and for mildew he car'd not a pin ;
 His crops never fail'd, for they grew on the chin.
 Unvex'd by the cares that ambition and state has,
 Contented he din'd on his daily potatoes ;
 And the pence that he earn'd by excision of bristle
 Were nightly devoted to wetting his whistle.

When copper ran low he made light of the matter, [Platter,
 Drank his purl upon tick at the old Pewter
 Read the news, and as deep in the secret appear'd
 As if he had lather'd the minister's beard.

But Cupid, who trims men of every station,
 And 'twixt barbers and beaux makes no discrimination,

Would not let this superlative shaver alone,
 Till he tried if his heart was as hard as his hone.

The fair one whose charms did the barber
 inthral, [stall.

At the end of Fleet-market, of fish kept a
 As red as her cheek was no lobster e'er seen,
 Not an eel that she sold was so soft as her skin.

By love strange effects have been wrought, we are told, [cold ;

In all countries and climates, hot, temp'rate, or Thus the heart of our barber love scorch'd like a coal,

Though 'tis very well known he liv'd under the pole.

First, he courted his charmer in sorrowful
 fashion,

And lied like a lawyer to move her compassion:
 He should perish, he swore, did his suit not succeed,

And a barber to slay was a barbarous deed.

Then he alter'd his tone, and was heard to de-
 If valor deserv'd the regard of the fair, [clare,
 That his courage was tried, though he scorn'd to disclose

How many brave fellows he'd took by the nose.

For his politics too, they were thoroughly
 known,

A patriot he was to the very backbone ;
 Wilkes he gratis had shav'd for the good of the nation, [ration.

And he held the Wig Club in profound vene-

For his tenets religious—he could well expound
 Emanuel Swedenborg's myst'ries profound,

And new doctrines could broach with the best of 'em all ;

For a periwig-maker ne'er wanted a caul.

Indignant she answer'd: "No chin-scraping sot
 Shall be fasten'd to me by the conjugal knot ;
 No ! to Tyburn repair, if a noose you must tie:
 Other fish I have got, Mr. Tonsor, to fry :

" Holborn-bridge and Blackfriars my triumphs
 can tell, [bell ;

From Billingsgate beauties I've long borne the Nay, tripemen and fishmongers vie for my favour :—

Then d'ye think I'll take up with a two-penny shaver ?

" Let dory, or turbot the sov'reign of fish,
 Cheek by jowl with red-herring be serv'd in one dish ;

Let sturgeon and sprats in one pickle unite,
 When I angle for husbands, and barbers shall bite."

But the barber persisted (ah, could I relate 'em)
 To ply her with compliments soft as pomatum ;
 And took ev'ry occasion to flatter and praise her,
 Till she fancied his wit was as keen as his razor.

He protested besides, if she'd grant his petition,
 She should live like a lady of rank and condition ;
 And to Billingsgate market no longer repair,
 But himself all her business would do to a hair.

Her smiles, he asserted, would melt even rocks,
 Nay, the fire of her eyes would consume barbers' blocks,

On insensible objects bestow animation,
 And give to old periwigs regeneration.

With fair speeches cajol'd, as you'd tickle a trout, [hold out:

'Gainst the barber the fish-wife no more could
 He applied the right bait, and with flattery he caught her :

Without flatt'ry a female's a fish out of water.

The state of her heart when the barber once
 guess'd,

Love's siege with redoubled exertion he press'd,
 And as briskly bestirr'd him, the charmer embracing,

As the wash-ball that dances and froths in his bason.

The flame to allay that their bosoms did so burn, [Holborn,

They set out for the church of St. Andrew in Where tonsors and trulls, country Dicks and their cousins,

In the halter of wedlock are tied up by dozens.

The nuptials to grace, came from every quarter
 The worthies at Rag-fair old caxons who barter,
 Who the coverings of judges' and counsellors'
 nob

Cut down into majors, queues, scratches, and bobs :

Muscle-mongers and oyster-men, crimps and coalheavers,

And butchers with marrow-bones smiting their cleavers :

Shrimp-scalders and bug-killers, tailors and
 tilers,

Boys, botchers, bawds, bailiffs, and black-pudding boilers.

From their voices united such melody flow'd,
 As the Abbey ne'er witness'd, nor Tot'nham
 Court-road ;

While St. Andrew's brave bells did so loud and so clear ring,

You'd have given ten pounds to've been out of their hearing.

For his fee, when the parson this couple had
 join'd,

As no cash was forthcoming, he took it in kind : [chin,

So the bridegroom dismantled his rev'rence's
 And the bride entertain'd him with pilchards and gin.

§ 135. William and Margaret.

WHEN all was wrapt in dark midnight,
And all were fast asleep,
In glided Margaret's grimly ghost,
And stood at William's feet.

Her face was like the April morn
Clad in a wintry cloud;
And clay-cold was her lily hand,
That held the sable shroud.

So shall the fairest face appear
When youth and years are flown;
Such is the robe that kings must wear
When death has reft their crown.

Her bloom was like the springing flow'r
That sips the silver dew;
The rose was budded in her cheek,
And opening to the view.

But love had, like the canker-worm,
Consum'd her early prime;
The rose grew pale, and left her cheek;
She died before her time.

Awake! she cried, thy true-love calls,
Come from her midnight grave;
Now let thy pity hear the maid
Thy love refus'd to save:

This is the dark and fearful hour
When injur'd ghosts complain:
Now dreary graves give up their dead,
To haunt the faithless swain.

Bethink thee, William, of thy fault,
Thy pledge and broken oath,
And give me back my maiden vow,
And give me back my troth.

How could you say my face was fair,
And yet that face forsake?
How could you win my virgin heart,
Yet leave that heart to break?

How could you promise love to me,
And not that promise keep?
Why did you swear my eyes were bright,
Yet leave those eyes to weep?

How could you say my lip was sweet,
And made the scarlet pale?
And why did I, young, witless maid,
Believe the flattering tale?

That face, alas! no more is fair,
That lip no longer red;
Dark are my eyes, now clos'd in death,
And every charm is fled.

The hungry worm my sister is,
This winding-sheet I wear;
And cold and weary lasts our night
Till that last morn appear.

But hark! the cock has warn'd me hence:
A long and last adieu!
Come see, false man! how low she lies
That died for love of you.

Now birds did sing, and Morning smil'd,
And show'd her glittering head;
Pale William shook in every limb,
Then, raving, left his bed.

He hied him to the fatal place
Where Marg'ret's body lay,
And stretch'd him on the green-grass turf
That wrapt her breathless clay:

And thrice he call'd on Marg'ret's name,
And thrice he wept full sore;
Then laid his cheek to the cold earth,
And word spoke never more.

§ 136. Lucy and Colin.

OF Leinster, fam'd for maidens fair,
Bright Lucy was the grace;
Nor e'er did Liffy's limpid stream
Reflect so fair a face;
Till luckless love, and pining care,
Impair'd her rosy hue,
Her coral lips and damask cheeks,
And eyes of glossy blue.

O have you seen a lily pale,
When beating rains descend?
So droop'd the slow-consuming maid,
Her life now near its end.

By Lucy warn'd, of flattering swains
Take heed, ye easy fair;
Of vengeance due to broken vows,
Ye perjur'd swains, beware.

Three times, all in the dead of night,
A bell was heard to ring,
And, shrieking at her window thrice,
A raven flapp'd his wing.

Too well the love-lorn maiden knew
The solemn boding sound,
And thus in dying words bespoke
The virgins weeping round:

I hear a voice you cannot hear,
Which says, I must not stay;
I see a hand you cannot see,
Which beckons me away.

By a false heart, and broken vows,
In early youth I die:
Am I to blame because his bride
Is thrice as rich as I?

Ah Colin! give not her thy vows,
Vows due to me alone;
Nor thou, fond maid, receive his kiss,
Nor think him all thy own.

To-morrow in the church to wed,
Impatient both prepare;
But know, fond maid, and know, false man,
That Lucy will be there!

There bear my corpse, ye comrades, bear,
The bridegroom blithe to meet;
He in his wedding-trim so gay,
I in my winding-sheet.—

She spoke, she died! her corse was borne,
The bridegroom blithe to meet,
He in his wedding-trim so gay,
She in her winding-sheet.

Then what were perjur'd Colin's thoughts?
 How were those nuptials kept?
 The bridemen flock'd round Lucy, dead,
 And all the village wept.
 Compassion, shame, remorse, despair,
 At once his bosom swell;
 The damps of death bedew'd his brows,
 He shook, he groan'd, he fell.
 From the vain bride (ah, bride no more!)
 The varying crimson fled;
 When, stretch'd before her rival's corse,
 She saw her husband dead.
 He, to his Lucy's new-made grave
 Convey'd by trembling swains,
 One mould with her, beneath one sod,
 For ever now remains.
 Oft at this grave the constant hind,
 And plighted maid are seen;
 With garlands gay, and true-love knots,
 They deck the sacred green.
 But, swain forsworn! whoe'er thou art,
 This hallow'd spot forbear;
 Remember Colin's dreadful fate,
 And fear to meet him there.

§ 137. Song. DIBDIN.

I SAW what seem'd a harmless child,
 With wings and bow
 And aspect mild,
 Who sobb'd, and sigh'd, and pin'd,
 And begg'd I would some boon bestow
 On a poor little boy, stone-blind.
 Not aware of the danger, I instant comply'd,
 When he drew from his quiver a dart,
 And cry'd, "My power you shall know!"
 Then he levell'd his bow,
 And wounded me right in the heart.

§ 138. The Race Horse. By the same.

SEE the course throng'd with gazers, the sports are begun,
 The confusion but hear!—I'll bet you, sir—
 Done!
 Ten thousand strange murmurs resound far and
 near,
 Lords, hawkers, and jockeys assail the tir'd ear:
 While, with neck like a rainbow, erecting his crest,
 Pamper'd, prancing, and pleas'd, his head
 touching his breast,
 Scarcely snuffing the air, he's so proud and elate,
 The high-mettled racer first starts for the plate.
 Now Reynard's turn'd out, and o'er hedge and ditch rush
 Hounds, horses, and huntsmen, all hard at his brush;
 They run him at length, and they have him at bay, [dious way:
 And by scent, and by view, cheat a long te-
 While, alike born for sports of the field and the course,
 Always sure to come through, a staunch and fleet horse;

When, fairly run down, the fox yields up his breath,

The high-mettled racer is in at the death.

Grown aged, us'd up, and turn'd out of the stud, [some blood;
 Lame, spavin'd, and wind-gall'd, but yet with
 While knowing postilions his pedigree trace,
 Tell his dam won this sweepstakes, his sire
 gain'd that race; [o'er,
 And what matches he won to the ostlers count
 As they loiter their time at some hedge-ale-house door;
 While the harness sore galls, and the spurs his sides goad,
 The high-mettled racer's a hack on the road.

Till, at last, having labor'd, drudg'd early and late,
 Bow'd down by degrees, he bends to his fate;
 Blind, old, lean, and feeble, he tugs round a mill, [stands still.
 Or draws sand, till the sand of his hour-glass
 And now, cold and lifeless, expos'd to the view
 In the very same cart which he yesterday drew,
 While a pitying crowd his sad relics surrounds,
 The high-mettled racer is sold for the hounds!

§ 139. Poor Jack. By the same.

Go patter to lubbers and swabs, d'ye see,
 'Bout danger, and fear, and the like;
 A tight-water boat and good sea-room give me,
 And t'ent to a little I'll strike;
 Though the tempest top-gallant masts smack
 smooth should smite,
 And shiver each splinter of wood;
 Clear the wreck, stow the yards, and bouse
 every thing tight,
 And under reef'd foresail we'll scud.
 Avast! nor don't think me a milksop so soft
 To be taken for trifles aback,
 For they says there's a Providence sits up aloft
 To keep watch for the life of Poor Jack.
 Why, I heard the good chaplain palaver one day
 About souls, heaven, mercy, and such,
 And, my timbers! what lingo he'd coil and belay!
 Why, 'twas just all as one as High Dutch.
 But he said how a sparrow can't founder, d'ye
 Without orders that come down below, [see,
 And many fine things that prov'd clearly to me
 That Providence takes us in tow.
 For, says he, do you mind me, let storms e'er
 Take the top-sails of sailors aback, [so oft
 There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft
 To keep watch for the life of Poor Jack.
 I said to our Poll, for you see she would cry,
 When at last we weigh'd anchor for sea,
 What argues sniv'ling, and piping your eye?
 Why, what a damn'd fool you must be!
 Can't you see the world's wide, and there's room for us all,
 Both for seamen and lubbers ashore?
 And if to old Davy I should go, friend Poll,
 Why, you never will hear of me more.

What then? all's a hazard: come don't be so
Perhaps I may laughing come back; [soft,
For, d'ye see, there's a cherub that sits up aloft
To keep watch for the life of Poor Jack.

D'ye mind me, a sailor should be every inch
All as one as a piece of the ship,
And with her brave the world without offering to flinch,

From the moment the anchor's a-trip.
As for me, in all weathers, all times, sides and ends,

Nought's a trouble from duty that springs;
For my heart is my Poll's, and my rhino's my friend's,

And as for my life, 'tis the king's.
Even when my time comes, ne'er believe me
so soft

As for grief to be taken aback:
That same little cherub that sits up aloft
Will look out a good birth for Poor Jack.

§ 140. By the same.

Of all sensations pity brings,
To proudly swell the ample heart,
From which the willing sorrow springs,
In others' grief that bears a part:
Of all sad sympathy's delights,
The manly dignity of grief,
A joy in mourning that excites,
And gives the anxious mind relief:
Of these would you the feeling know,
Most gen'rous, noble, greatly brave,
That ever taught a heart to glow,
'Tis the tear that bedews a soldier's grave.

For hard and painful is his lot;
Let dangers come, he braves them all;
Valiant, perhaps, to be forgot,
Or undistinguish'd doom'd to fall.
Yet wrapt in conscious worth secure,
The world, that now forgets his toil,
He views from a retreat obscure,
And quits it with a willing smile.
Then, trav'ller, one kind drop bestow,
'Twere graceful pity, nobly brave;
Nought ever taught the heart to glow
Like the tear that bedews a soldier's grave.

§ 141. By the same.

WHAT though from Venus Cupid sprung,
No attribute divine
(Whate'er the bawling bards have sung)
Had he, his bow till Bacchus strung,
And dipt his darts in wine;
Till old Silenus plung'd the boy
In nectar from the vine:
Then love, that was before a toy,
Became the source of mortal joy;
The urchin shook his dewy wings,
And careless levell'd clowns and kings;
Such power has mighty wine!

When Theseus on the naked shore
Fair Ariadne left,
D'ye think she did her fate deplore,
Or her fine locks or bosom tore,
Like one of hope bereft?
Not she, indeed. Her fleeting love
From mortal turns divine;
And as gay Bacchus' tigers move,
His car ascends amidst a grove
Of vines, surrounded by a throng,
Who lead the jolly pair along,
Almost half-gone with wine.

Ma'am Helen lov'd the Phrygian boy,
He thought her all his own;
But hottest love will soonest cloy,
He ne'er had brought her safe to Troy
But for the wife of Thone.
She, merry gossip, mix'd a cup
Of tippie right divine,
To keep love's flagging spirits up,
And Helen drank it every sup:
This liquor is 'mongst learned elves
Nepenthe call'd; but, 'twixt ourselves
'Twas nothing more than wine.

Of Lethe, and its flow'ry brink,
Let musty poets prate,
Where thirsty souls are said to drink,
That never they again may think
Upon their former state:
What is there in this soulless lot,
I pray you, so divine?
Grief finds the palace and the cot,
Which, for a time, were well forgot;
Come here then, in our Lethe share,
The true oblivion of your care
Is only found in wine.

§ 142. By the same.

YANKO he tell, and he tell no lie,
We near one pretty brook,
Him flowing hair, him lovely eye,
Sweetly on Orra look:
Him see big world, fine warrior men,
Grand cruel king love blood;
Great king! but Yanko say what den
If he no honest good?

Virtue in foe be virtue still,
Fine stone be found in mine:
The sun one dale, as well one hill,
Make warm where'er him shine.
You broder him, him broder you,
So all the world should call;
For nature say, and she say true,
'That men be broder all.

If cruel man, like tiger grim,
Come bold in thirst of blood,
Poor man: be noble, pity him,
'That he no honest good:
Virtue in foe be virtue still,
Fine stone be found in mine:
The sun one dale, as well one hill,
Make warm where'er him shine.

§ 143. Yanko. By the same.

DEAR Yanko say, and true he say,
 All mankind, one and t' other,
 Negro, mulatto, and Malay,
 Through all the world be broder.
 In black, in yellow, what disgrace,
 That scandal so he use 'em?
 For dere no virtue in de face,
 De virtue in de bosom.

What harm dere in a shape or make?
 What harm in ugly feature?
 Whatever color, form, he take,
 The heart make human creature.
 Then black and copper both be friend,
 No color he bring beauty;
 For beauty, Yanko say, attend
 On him who do him duty.
 Dear Yanko say, &c.

§ 144. Let us all be unhappy together. By the same.

WE bipeds, made up of frail clay,
 Alas! are the children of sorrow;
 And, though brisk and merry to-day,
 We may all be unhappy to-morrow.
 For sunshine's succeeded by rain;
 Then, fearful of life's stormy weather,
 Lest pleasure should only bring pain,
 Let us all be unhappy together.

I grant the best blessing we know
 Is a friend, for true friendship's a treasure;
 And yet, lest your friend prove a foe,
 Oh! taste not the dangerous pleasure.
 Thus friendship's a flimsy affair,
 Thus riches and health are a bubble;
 Thus there's nothing delightful but care,
 Nor any thing pleasing but trouble.

If a mortal would point out that life
 Which on earth could be nearest to heaven,
 Let him, thanking his stars, choose a wife
 To whom truth and honor are given.
 But honor and truth are so rare,
 And horns, when they're cutting, so tingle,
 That, with all my respect to the fair,
 I'd advise him to sigh, and live single.

It appears from these premises plain,
 That wisdom is nothing but folly;
 That pleasure's a term that means pain,
 And that joy is your true melancholy:
 That all those who laugh ought to cry,
 That 'tis fine frisk and fun to be grieving;
 And that, since we must all of us die,
 We should taste no enjoyment while living.

§ 145. The Soldier's Adieu. By the same.

ADIEU, adieu, my only life!
 My honor calls me from thee;
 Remember thou'rt a soldier's wife,
 Those tears but ill become thee.

What though by duty I am call'd
 Where thund'ring cannons rattle,
 Where Valor's self might stand appall'd?
 When on the wings of thy dear love
 To Heaven above
 Thy fervent orisons are flown,
 The tender prayer
 Thou putt'st up there
 Shall call a guardian angel down,
 To watch me in the battle.

My safety thy fair truth shall be,
 As sword and buckler serving;
 My life shall be more dear to me,
 Because of thy preserving.
 Let peril come, let horror threat,
 Let thund'ring cannons rattle,
 I'll fearless seek the conflict's heat,
 Assur'd when on the wings of love
 To Heaven above, &c.

Enough. With that benignant smile
 Some kindred god inspir'd thee;
 Who knew thy bosom void of guile,
 Who wonder'd and admir'd thee.
 I go assur'd: my life, adieu;
 Though thund'ring cannons rattle,
 Though murdering carnage stalk in view,
 When on the wings of thy true love
 To Heaven above, &c.

§ 146. Indian Song. By the same.

THE sun's descending in the wave;
 I go, I go, my fate to brave:
 Ghosts of dead incas, now appear,
 Shriek as ye come
 Cold from the tomb,
 And see if Moniaco knows to fear.
 Oh Sun, my sire!
 Lend me all thy noble fire:
 Illia Moniaco to thy tomb,
 Oh Atabalipa, soon shall come;
 Cover me with scars,
 Nought can control
 The dauntless soul,
 That shall live among its kindred stars.

What is't to die? To leave this clay,
 And breathe an everlasting day,
 For robes celestial shake off dust;
 Among the blest,
 From care to rest,
 And emulate the virtues of the just:
 Then, Sun, my sire,
 Lend me all thy noble fire,
 Illia Moniaco, &c.

Adieu, ye friends! vain world, adieu!
 Bliss is for me, but woe for you;
 While I, new-born, shall go to find
 The upper heaven,
 You shall be driven
 Like scatter'd chaff before false fortune's wind.
 Now, Sun, my sire,
 I feel, I feel thy noble fire!
 Illia Moniaco, &c.

§ 147. By the same.

HARK the din of distant war,
 How noble is the clangor!
 Pale Death ascends his ebon car,
 Clad in terrific anger.
 A doubtful fate the soldier tries
 Who joins the gallant quarrel:
 Perhaps on the cold ground he lies,
 No wife, no friend, to close his eyes,
 Though nobly mourn'd;
 Perhaps, return'd,
 He's crown'd with victory's laurel.

How many, who, disdain'g fear,
 Rush on the desperate duty,
 Shall claim the tribute of the tear
 That dims the eye of beauty?
 A doubtful fate, &c.

What nobler fate can fortune give?
 Renown shall tell our story
 If we should fall; but if we live,
 We live our country's glory.
 'Tis true, a doubtful fate, &c.

§ 148. By the same.

POOR Peggy lov'd a soldier lad
 More, far more, than tongue can tell ye;
 Yet was her tender bosom sad
 When'er she heard the loud reveiller.
 The fifes were screech-owls to her ears,
 The drums like thunder seem'd to rattle;
 Ah, too prophetic were her fears,
 They call'd him from her arms to battle.
 There wonders he against the foe
 Perform'd, and was with laurels crown'd;
 Vain pomp! for soon death laid him low
 On the cold ground.

Her heart all love, her soul all truth,
 That none her fears or flight discover,
 Poor Peg, in guise a comely youth,
 Follow'd to the field her lover.
 Directed by the fife and drum
 To where the work of death was doing;
 Where of brave hearts the time was come,
 Who, seeking honor, grasp at ruin:
 Her very soul was chill'd with woe,
 New horror came in every sound,
 And whisper'd, death had laid him low
 On the cold ground.

With mute affliction as she stood,
 While her woman's fears confound her,
 With terror all her soul subdued,
 A mourning train came thronging round her.
 The plaintive fife, and muffled drum,
 The marshal obsequies discover;
 His name she heard, and cried, I come,
 Faithful to meet my murder'd lover!
 Then heart-rent by a sigh of woe,
 Fell, to the grief of all around,
 Where death had laid her lover low
 On the cold ground!

§ 149. Song. STEPHENS.

ONCE the gods of the Greeks, at ambrosial feast,
 Large bowls of rich nectar were quaffing,
 Merry Momus among them appeared as a guest:
 Homer says the celestials love laughing.
 This happen'd 'fore Chaos was fix'd into form,
 While nature disorderly lay;
 While elements adverse engender'd the storm,
 And uproar embroil'd the loud fray.

On every Olympic the humorist droll'd,
 So none could his jokes disapprove;
 He sung, reparteed, and some old stories told,
 And at last thus began upon Jove:
 Sire, mark how yon matter is heaving below,
 Were it settled 't would please all your court;
 'Tis not wisdom to let it lie useless, you know;
 Pray people it, just for our sport.

Jove nodded assent, all Olympus bow'd down,
 At his fiat creation took birth;
 The cloud-keeping deity smil'd on his throne,
 Then announc'd the production was earth.
 To honour their sov'reign each god gave a boon:
 Apollo presented it light;
 The goddess of child-bed dispatch'd us a moon,
 To silver the shadow of night:

The queen of soft wishes, foul Vulcan's fair bride,
 Leer'd wanton on her man of war; [guide.
 Saying, As to these earth-folks, I'll give them a
 So she sparkled the morn and eve star.
 From her cloud, all in spirits, the goddess up sprung,
 In ellipsis each planet advanc'd;
 The tune of the spheres the Nine Sisters sung,
 As round Terra Nova they danc'd.

Even Jove himself could not insensible stand,
 Bid Saturn his girdle fast bind: [hand,
 The expounder of fate grasp'd the globe in his
 And laugh'd at those mites call'd mankind.
 From the hand of great Jove into space it was hurl'd,

He was charm'd with the roll of the ball,
 Bid his daughter Attraction take charge of the
 And she hung it up high in his hall. [world,

Miss, pleas'd with the present, review'd the globe round,

Saw with rapture hills, valleys, and plains;
 The self-balan'd orb in an atmosphere bound,
 Prolific by suns, dews, and rains.

With silver, gold, jewels, she India endow'd, France and Spain she taught vineyards to rear;

What was fit for each clime on each clime she
 bestow'd,
 And freedom she found flourish'd here.

The blue-ey'd celestial, Minerva the wise,
 Ineffably smil'd on the spot;
 My dear, says plum'd Pallas, your last gift I
 prize,
 But, excuse me, one thing is forgot.

Licentiousness freedom's destruction may bring,
Unless prudence prepares its defence.
The goddess of sapience bid Iris take wing,
And on Britons bestow'd common-sense.

Four cardinal virtues she left in this isle,
As guardians to cherish the root;

The blossoms of liberty gaily 'gan smile,
And Englishmen fed on the fruit.
Thus fed, and thus bred, by a bounty so rare,
Oh! preserve it as pure as 'twas giv'n.
We will while we've breath; nay we'll grasp
it in death,
And return it untainted to heav'n.

PROLOGUES AND EPILOGUES.

§ 1. Epilogue to A Woman killed with Kindness. 1617.

AN honest crew, disposed to be merry,
Came to a tavern by, and call'd for wine:
The drawer brought it (smiling like a cherry),
And told them it was pleasant, neat, and fine.
Taste it, quoth one; he did: O fie! (quoth he):
This wine was good: now 't runs too near the lee.

Another sipp'd to give the wine his due,
And said unto the rest it drank too flat;
The third said it was old; the fourth too new;
Nay, quoth the fifth, the sharpness likes me
not.
Thus, gentlemen, you see how in one hour
The wine was new, old, flat, sharp, sweet, and sour.

Unto this wine do we allude our play; [grave:
Which some will judge too trivial, some too
You, as our guests, we entertain this day,
And bid you welcome to the best we have.
Excuse me then; good wine may be disgrac'd
When ev'ry sev'ral mouth has sundry taste.

§ 2. Prologue to The Unfortunate Lovers. Spoken at Black-Friars. 1643. DAVENANT.

WERE you but half so humble to confess,
As you are wise to know, your happiness;
Our author would not grieve to see you sit Ruling with such unquestion'd pow'r his wit:
What would I give, that I could still preserve
My loyalty to him, and yet deserve
Your kind opinion by revealing now
The cause of that great storm which clouds his brow; [you,
And his close murmurs, which, since meant to
I cannot think or mannerly or true!
Well; I begin to be resolv'd, and let
My melancholy tragic Monsieur fret;
Let him the several harmless weapons use
Of that all-daring trifle call'd his Musé.
Yet I'll inform you what, this very day,
Twice before witness I have heard him say;
Which is, that you are grown excessive proud;
For ten times more of wit, than was allow'd
Your silly ancestors in twenty year, [here:
Y' expect should in two hours be given you

For they, he swears, to th' theatre would come
Ere they had din'd, to take up the best room;
There sit on benches, not adorn'd with mats,
And graciously did vail their high-crown'd hats
To every half-dress'd player, as he still Thro' th' hangings peep'd to see how the house did fill.

Good easy-judging souls! with what delight
They would expect a gig or target fight;
A furious tale of Troy, which they ne'er thought
Was weakly written, so 'twere strongly fought;
Laugh'd at a clinch, the shadow of a jest,
And cry'd 'A passing good one, I protest!'
Such dull and humble-witted people were
Even your forefathers, whom we govern'd here;
And such had you been too, he swears, had not
The poets taught you how to unweave a plot,
And trace the winding scenes; taught you t'
admit [wit.

What was true sense, not what did sound like Thus they have arm'd you 'gainst themselves to fight, [write.
Made strong and mischievous from what they
You have been lately highly feasted here.
With two great wits*, that grac'd our theatre.
But, if to feed you often with delight
Will more corrupt, than mend, your appetite;
He vows to use you, which he much abhors,
As others did your homely ancestors.

§ 3. Epilogue to The Cutter of Coleman-street, spoken by the Person who acted Cutter. 1656. COWLEY.

METHINKS a vision bids me silence break,
[Without his Peruke.
And some words to this congregation speak;
So great and gay a one I ne'er did meet
At the fifth monarch's court in Coleman-street;
But yet I wonder much, not to espy a
Brother in all this court, call'd Zephaniah.
Bless me! what are we? what may this place
be?
For I begin my vision now to see,
That this is a mere theatre—Well then,
If't be e'en so, I'll Cutter be again.
[Puts on his Peruke.

* Beaumont and Fletcher.

Not Cutter the pretended cavalier ;
For, to confess ingenuously here
To you, who always of that party were,
I never was of any ; up and down
I roll'd, a very rake-hell of this town.
But now my follies and my faults are ended,
My fortune and my mind are both amended ;
And if we may believe one who has fail'd before, [no more.
Our author says he'll mend—that is, he'll write

§ 4. Prologue to Nero. 1675. LEE.

GOOD plays, and perfect sense, as scarce are grown
 As civil women in this d—d lewd town ;
 Plain sense is despicable as plain clothes,
 As English hats, bone-lace, or woollen hose.
 'Tis your brisk fool that is your man of note ;
 Yonder he goes, in the embroider'd coat :
 Such wenching eyes, and hands so prone to ruffle,
 The genteel fling, the trip, and modish shuffle ;
 Salt soul and flame, as gay as any prince ;
 Thus tags and silks make up your men of sense.
 I'm told that some are present here to-day
 Who, ere they see, resolve to damn this play,
 So much would interest with ill-nature sway.
 But, ladies, you, we hope, will prove more civil,
 And charm these wits that damn beyond the
 Then let each critic here all hell inherit, { devil ;
 You have attractions that can lay a spirit.
 A bloody fatal play you'll see to-night ;
 I vow to God, 't has put me in a fright.
 The meanest waiter huffs, looks big, and struts,
 Gives breast a blow, then hand on hilt he puts.
 'Tis a fine age, a tearing thundering age,
 Pray heaven this thund'ring does not crack the
 This play I like not now—— [stage :
 And yet, for aught I know, it may be good,
 But still I hate this fighting, wounds, and blood. [nour ?
 Why, what the devil have I to do with Ho-
 Let heroes court her ; I cry, Pox upon her !
 All tragedies, i'gad, to me sound oddly ;
 I can no more be serious, than you godly.

§ 5. Epilogue to Tyrannic Love; spoken by Nell Gwyn, when she was to be carried off dead by the bearers. 1672. DRYDEN.

To the Bearer.

HOLD! are you mad, you damn'd confounded dog?

I am to rise, and speak the epilogue.

To the Audience.

I come, kind gentlemen, strange news to tell ye;
I am the ghost of poor departed Nelly.
Sweet ladies, be not frightened, I'll be civil:
I'm what I was, a little harmless devil;
For, after death, we sprites have just such na-
tures [tures:
We had, for all the world, when human crea-
And therefore I, that was an actress here,
Play all my tricks in hell, a goblin there.

Gallants, look to't; you say there are no sprites;
But I'll come dance about your beds at nights;
And 'faith you'll be in a sweet kind of taking,
When I surprise you between sleep and waking.
To tell you true, I walk, because I die
Out of my calling, in a tragedy.
O poet, damn'd dull poet! who could prove
So senseless, to make Nelly die for love!
Nay, what's yet worse, to kill me in my prime
Of Easter-term, in tart and cheesecake time!
I'll fit the fop; for I'll not one word say,
T' excuse his godly out-of-fashion play;
A play which if you dare but twice sit out,
You'll all be slander'd, and be thought devout.
But farewell, gentlemen; make haste to me;
I'm sure ere long to have your company.
As for my epitaph, when I am gone,
I'll trust no poet, but will write my own:
Here Nelly lies, who, tho' she liv'd a slattern*,
Yet died a princess, acting in St. Cath'rinet†.

§ 6. Prologue to Alcibiades. 1675. OTWAY.

NEVER did rhymer greater hazards run,
'Mongst us by your severity undone ;
Tho' we, alas ! to oblige ye have done most,
And bought ye pleasures at our own sad cost,
Yet all our best endeavours have been lost.
So oft a statesman lab'ring to be good,
His honesty's for treason understood ;
Whilst some false flattering minion of the court
Shall play the traitor, and be honour'd for't.
To you, known judges of what's sense and wit,
Our author swears he gladly will submit :
But there's a sort of things infest the pit,
That would be witty spite of nature too,
And, to be thought so, haunt and pester you.
Hither sometimes those would-be-wits repair,
In quest of you ; where, if you don't appear,
Cries one—Pugh ! D—n me, what do we do
here ?
Straight up he starts, his garniture then puts
In order, so he cocks, and out he struts
To the coffee-house, where he about him looks :
Spies friend ; cries, Jack—I've been to-night at
th' Duke's ;
The silly rogues are all undone, my dear,
I'gad, not one of sense that I saw there.
Thus to himself he'd reputation gather
Of wit, and good acquaintance, but has neither.
Wit has indeed a stranger been, of late ;
'Mongst its pretenders, nought so strange as that.
Both houses too so long a fast have known,
That coarsest nonsense goes most glibly down.
Thus though this trifler never wrote before,
Yet faith he ventured on the common score :
Since nonsense is so generally allow'd,
He hopes that this may pass amongst the crowd.

§ 7. Epilogue to Aurengzebe. 1676.

DRYDEN.

A PRETTY task ! and so I told the fool,
Who needs would undertake to please by rule :

* Her real character.

† The character she represented in the play.

He thought that if his characters were good,
The scenes entire, and freed from noise and
blood,
The action great, yet circumscrib'd by time,
The words not forc'd, but sliding into rhyme,
The passions rais'd and calm'd by just degrees,
As tides are swell'd and then retire to seas;
He thought in hinting these his bus'ness done,
Though he, perhaps, has fail'd in ev'ry one.
But, after all, a poet must confess,
His art's like physic, but a happy guess.
Your pleasure on your fancy must depend;
The lady's pleas'd, just as she likes her friend.
No song! no dance! no show! he fears you'll say,

You love all naked beauties, but a play.
He much mistakes your methods to delight,
And, like the French, abhors our target fight:
But those damn'd dogs can never be i'th' right.
True English hate your Monsieurs' paltry arts;
For you are all silk-weavers* in your hearts.
Bold Britons, at a brave bear-garden fray,
Are rous'd, and, clatt'ring sticks, cry, Play,
play, play!
Mean time, your fribbling foreigner will stare,
And mutter to himself, Ah, gens barbare!
And, 'gad, 'tis well he mutters, well for him;
Our butchers else would tear him limb from limb.

'Tis true, the time may come, your sons may be Infected with this French civility:
But this in after-ages will be done;
Our poet writes an hundred years too soon.
This age comes on too slow or he too fast;
And early springs are subject to a blast.
Who would excel, when few can make a test
Betwixt indifferent writing and the best?
For favours cheap and common who would strive,

Which, like abandon'd prostitutes, you give?
Yet scatter'd here and there I some behold,
Who can discern the tinsel from the gold;
To these he writes; and, if by them allow'd,
'Tis their prerogative to rule the crowd;
For he more fears (like a presuming man)
Their votes who cannot judge, than theirs who can.

§ 8. Epilogue to the First Part of The Rover, or the Banished Cavaliers. 1677. Mrs. BEHN.

THE banish'd cavaliers! a roving blade!
A popish carnival! a masquerade!
The devil's in't if this will please the nation,
In these our blessed times of reformation,
When conventicling is so much in fashion.
And yet——
That mutinous tribe less factions do beget,
Than your continual differing in wit.
Your judgment (as your passion) 's a disease;
Nor Muse nor Miss your appetite can please;
You're grown as nice as queasy consciences,

Whose each convulsion, when the spirit moves,
Damns every thing that maggot disapproves.
With canting rule you would the stage refine,
And to dull method all our sense confine.
With th' insolence of commonwealths you rule,
Where each gay fop, and politic brave fool,
On monarch Wit impose without controul.
As for the last, who seldom sees a play,
Unless it be the old Black-Friars way,
Shaking his empty noddle o'er bamboo,
He cries, Good faith, these plays will never do.
Ah, sir! in my young days, what lofty wit,
What high-strain'd scenes of fighting, there were writ!

These are slight airy toys. But tell me, pray,
What has the House of Commons done to-day?
Then shows his politics, to let you see
Of state affairs he'll judge as notably
As he can do of wit and poetry.

The younger sparks, who hither do resort,
Cry——

Pox o' your gentle things! give us more sport;
Damme! I'm sure 't will never please the court.

Such fops are never pleas'd, unless the play
Be stuff'd with fools, as brisk and dull as they;
Such might the half-crown spare, and in a glass

At home behold a more accomplish'd ass;
Where they may set their cravats, wigs, and faces,

And practise all their buffoon'ry grimaces—
See how this huff becomes—this damme stare,
Which they at home may act, because they dare;

But must with prudent caution do elsewhere.
O, that our Nokes, or Tony Lee, could shew
A fop but half so much to th' life as you!

§ 9. Epilogue to The Duke of Guise. 1683.
Spoken by Mrs. Cook. DRYDEN.

MUCH time and trouble this poor play has cost,
And, 'faith, I doubted once the cause was lost.
Yet no one man was meant, nor great nor
small;

Our poets, like frank gamesters†, threw at all.
They took no single aim——

But like bold boys, true to their prince and heartly,

Huzza'd, and fir'd broadsides at the whole party.
Duels are crimes; but when the cause is right
In battle every man is bound to fight:

For what should hinder me to sell my skin
Dear as I could, if once my heart were in?

Se defendendo never was a sin.

'Tis a fine world, my masters—right or wrong,
The Whigs must talk, and Tories hold their tongue.

They must do all they can——

But we, forsooth, must bear a Christian mind,
And fight like boys with one hand tied behind:
Nay, and when one boy's down 'twere wondrous wise

To cry, Box fair, and give him time to rise.

* Alluding to the rivalry of the Spitalfields manufactures with those of France.

† This play was written jointly by Dryden and Lee.

When fortune favours, none but fools will dally:

Would any of you, sparks, if Nan or Mally Tipp'd you th' inviting wink, stand, Shall I, shall I?

A trimmer cried (that heard me tell the story) Fie, Mistress Cook! 'faith you're too rank a Tory!

Wish not Whigs hang'd, but pity their hard You women love to see men make wry faces. Pray, Sir, said I, don't think me such a Jew; I say no more, but give the devil his due.

Lenitives, says he, best suit with our condition. Jack Ketch, says I, 's an excellent physician. I love no blood. Nor I, Sir, as I breathe; But hanging is a fine dry kind of death.

We trimmers are for holding all things even. Yes, just like him that hung 'twixt hell and heaven.

Have we not had men's lives enough already?— Yes, sure; but you're for holding all things steady.

Now, since the weight hangs all on one side, You trimmers should, to poise it, hang on t'other.

Damn'd neuters, in their middle way of steering, Are neither fish nor flesh, nor good red-herring: Not Whigs nor Tories they, nor this nor that; Nor birds, nor beasts, but just a kind of bat; A twilight animal, true to neither cause, With Tory wings, but Whiggish teeth and claws.

§ 10. Prologue to The Mistakes, a Play written by Joseph Harris, comedian. 1690.

DRYDEN.

Enter Mr. Bright.

GENTLEMEN, we must beg your pardon; here's no prologue to be had to-day; our new play is like to come on without a frontispiece; as bald as one of you young beaux without your periwig. I left our young poet snivelling and sobbing behind the scenes, and cursing somebody that has deceived him,

Enter Mr. Bowen.

Hold your prating to the audience; here is honest Mr. Williams just come in, half mellow, from the Rose Tavern. He swears he is inspir'd with claret, and will come on, and that extempore too, either with a prologue of his own, or something like one. O, here he comes to his trial, at all adventures: for my part I wish him a good deliverance.

[Exeunt Mr. Bright and Mr. Bowen.]

Enter Mr. Williams.

Save ye, Sirs, save ye! I'm in a hopeful way, I should speak something, in rhyme, now, for the play:

But the deuce take me if I know what to say. I'll stick to my friend the author, that I can tell To the last drop of claret in my belly. [ye,

So far I'm sure 'tis rhyme—that needs no granting: [are wanting.

And, if my verses' feet stumble—you see my own Our young poet has brought a piece of work, In which tho' much of art there does not lurk, It may hold out three days—and that's as long as Cork*.

But for this play—(which till I have done we show not)

What may be its fortune—by the Lord—I know This I dare swear, no malice here is writ: [not. 'Tis innocent of all things—even of wit.

He's no high-flyer—he makes no sky-rockets, His squibs are only levell'd at your pockets: And if his crackers light among your pelf, Ye are blown up; if not, then he's blown up himself. [fluster'd madness:

By this time I'm something recover'd of my And now, a word or two in sober sadness.

Ours is a common play; and you pay down A common harlot's price—just half a crown. You'll say, I play the pimp on my friend's score; But since 'tis for a friend, your gibes give o'er: For many a mother has done that before.

How's this? you cry: an actor write! we know it;

But Shakspeare was an actor and a poet. Has not great Jonson's learning often fail'd, While Shakspeare's greater genius still prevail'd? Have not some writing actors, in this age, Deserv'd and found success upon the stage? To tell the truth, when our old wits are tir'd, Not one of us but means to be inspir'd.

Let your kind presence grace our homely cheer; Peace and the butt, is all our bus'ness here; So much for that, and the devil take small beer.

§ 11. Prologue to the Old Bachelor. 1693.

CONGREVE.

How this vile world is chang'd! In former days Prologues were serious speeches before plays; Grave, solemn things (as graces are to feasts), Where poets begg'd a blessing from their guests.

But now no more like suppliants we come! A play makes war, and prologue is the drum. Arm'd with keen satire, and with pointed wit,

We threaten you, who do for judges sit, To save our plays; or else we'll damn your pit.

But for your comfort, it falls out to-day, We've a young author, and his first-born play:

So, standing only on his good behaviour, He's very civil, and entreats your favour.

Not but the man has malice, would he show it: But, on my conscience, he's a bashful poet;

You think that strange—no matter; he'll out-grow it.

Well, I'm his advocate—by me he prays you, (I don't know whether I shall speak to please you)

He prays—O bless me! what shall I do now? Hang me if I know what he prays, or how!

And 'twas the prettiest prologue as he wrote it: Well, the deuce take me if I ha'n't forgot it.

* The siege of the city of Cork.

O Lord! for Heaven's sake excuse the play,
Because, you know, if it be damn'd to-day,
I shall be hang'd for wanting what to say.
For my sake then—but I'm in such confusion,
I cannot stay to hear your resolution. [Runs off.]

§ 12. Prologue, spoken by Lord Buckhurst, at Westminster School, at a Representation of Mr. Dryden's CLEOMENES, the Spartan Hero, at Christmas, 1695. PRIOR.

PISH! Lord, I wish this prologue was but Greek,

Then young Cleonidas would boldly speak:
But can Lord Buckhurst in poor English say,
Gentle spectators, pray excuse the play?
No, witness all ye gods of ancient Greece,
Rather than condescend to terms like these,
I'd go to school six hours on Christmas-day,
Or construe Persius while my comrades play.
Such work by hireling actors should be done,
Who tremble when they see a critic frown;
Poor rogues, that smart, like fencers, for their bread,

And if they are not wounded, are not fed.
But, sirs, our labor has more noble ends,
We act our tragedy to see our friends:
Our gen'rous scenes are for pure love repeated,
And if you are not pleas'd, at least you're treated.
The candles and the clothes ourselves we bought,
Our tops neglected, and our balls forgot.
To learn our parts we left our midnight bed,
Most of you snor'd whilst Cleomenes read.
Not that from this confession we would sue
Praise undeserv'd; we know ourselves and you:
Resolv'd to stand or perish by our cause,
We neither censure fear, nor beg applause,
For those are Westminster and Sparta's laws.
Yet if we see some judgement well inclin'd,
To young desert and growing virtue kind,
That critic by ten thousand marks should know,
That greatest souls to goodness only bow;
And that your little hero does inherit
Not Cleomenes' more than Dorset's spirit.

§ 13. Prologue to the Royal Mischief. 1696. PRIOR.

LADIES, to you with pleasure we submit
This early offspring of a virgin-wit.
From your good-nature nought our authoress
fears:

Sure you'll indulge, if not the muse, her years;
Freely, the praise she may deserve, bestow;
Pardon, not censure, what you can't allow;
Smile on the work, be to her merits kind,
And to her faults, whate'er they are, be blind.

Let critics follow rules; she boldly writes
What Nature dictates, and what Love indites.
By no dull forms her queen and ladies move,
But court their heroes, and agnize their love.
Poor maid! she'd have (what e'en no wife would crave)

A husband love his spouse beyond the grave:
And, from a second marriage to deter,
Shows you what horrid things step-mothers are.

Howe'er, to constancy the prize she gives,
And though the sister dies, the brother lives.
Blest with success, at last he mounts a throne,
Enjoys at once his mistress and a crown.
Learn, ladies, then, from Libaraxa's fate,
What great rewards on virtuous lovers wait.
Learn too, if Heaven and fate should adverse prove,

(For fate and Heaven don't always smile on love)
Learn with Zelinda to be still the same,
Nor quit your first for any second flame:
Whatever fate, or death or life, be given,
Dare to be true, submit the rest to Heaven.

§ 14. Prologue to Love and a Bottle. 1699. FARQUHAR.

[Servant attending with a Bottle of Wine.]

As stubborn atheists who disdain to pray,
Repent, though late, upon their dying day;
So in their pangs most authors, rack'd with fears,
Implore your mercy in our suppliant prayers.
But our new author has no cause maintain'd,
Let him not lose what he has never gain'd:
Love and a bottle are his peaceful arms;
Ladies and gallants, have not those some charms?
For love, all mankind to the fair must sue;
And, sirs, the bottle he presents to you.
Health to the play I toast [Drinks.—e'en let
it pass,

Sure none sit here that will refuse their glass!
O there's a damning soldier—let me think—
He looks as he were sworn—to what? To drink.
[Drinks.]

Come on then; foot to foot be boldly set,
And our young author's new commission wet.
He and his bottle here attend their doom,
From you the poet's Helicon must come;
If he has any foes, to make amends
He gives his service [Drinks.—Sure you now are friends;

No critic here will he provoke to fight;
The day be theirs, he only begs his night.
Pray pledge him now, secur'd from all abuse;
Then name the health you love, let none refuse.

§ 15. Prologue to the Constant Couple. 1700. FARQUHAR.

POETS will think nothing so checks their fury,
As wits, cits, beaux, and women, for their jury.
Our spark's half-dead to think what medleys come,
With blended judgements, to pronounce his doom.

'Tis all false fear; for in a mingled pit,
Why, what your grave don thinks but dully writ,
His neighbour i' th' great wig may take for wit.
Some authors court the few, the wise if any:
Our youth's content, if he can reach the many,
Who go with much like ends to church and play,
Not to observe what priests or poets say—
No, no! your thoughts, like theirs, lie quite another way.

The ladies safe may smile, for here's no slander,
No smut, no lewd-tongued beau, no double en- tendre.

'Tis true, he has a spark just come from France,
But then, so far from beau—why, he talks sense,
Like coin, oft carried out, but—seldom brought from thence.

There's yet a gang to whom our spark submits,
Your elbow-shaking fool that lives by's wits,
That's only witty though, just as he lives, by fits:
Who, lion-like, through bailiffs scours away,
Hunts, in the face of dinner, all the day,
At night with empty bowels grumbles o'er the
play.

And now the modish prentice he implores,
Who, with his master's cash, stol'n out of doors,
Employs it on a brace of—honorable whores:
While their good bulky mother pleas'd sits by,
Bawd-regent of the bubble-gallery.

Next to our mounted friends we humbly move,
Who all your side-box tricks are much above,
And never fail to pay us with your love.

Ah, friends! poor Dorset Garden-house is gone;
Our merry meetings there are all undone:

Quite lost to us, sure for some strange misdeeds,
That strong dog Samson's pull'd it o'er our heads, Snaps rope like thread; but when his fortune's told him,

He'll hear perhaps of rope will one day hold him:
At least, I hope that our good-natur'd town
Will find a way to pull his prices down.

Well, that's all! Now, gentlemen, for the play:
On second thoughts, I've but two words to say;
Such as it is, for your delight design'd,
Hear it, read, try, judge, and speak as you find.

§ 16. Prologue to The Inconstant. 1702.

FARQUHAR.

LIKE hungry guests a sitting audience looks:
Plays are like suppers; poets are the cooks:
The founders you: the table is the place:
The carvers we: the prologue is the grace:
Each act a course; each scene a diff'rent dish:
Though we're in Lent, I doubt you're still for flesh.

Satire's the sauce, high-season'd, sharp, and rough;

Kind masks and beaux, I hope you're pepper-proof.

Wit is the wine; but 'tis so scarce the true,
Poets, like vintners, balderdash and brew.

Your surly scenes, where rant and bloodshed
Are butcher's meat, a battle's a sirloin: [join,
Your scenes of love, so flowing, soft, and chaste,
Are water-gruel, without salt or taste.

Bawdy's fat venison, which, though stale, can
please:

Your rakes love haut-gouts, like your damn'd
French cheese.

Your rarity, for the fair guest to gape on,
Is your nice squeaker, or Italian capon;

Or your French virgin-pullet, garnish'd round
And dress'd with sauce of some—four hundred pound.

An opera, like an oglio, nicks the age;
Farce is the hasty-pudding of the stage:
For when you're treated with indifferent cheer,
You can dispense with slender stage-coach fare.
A pastoral's whipt-cream; stage-whims, mere trash;

And tragi-comedy, half fish and flesh.
But comedy, that, that's the darling cheer;
This night, we hope, you'll an Inconstant bear;
Wild-fowl is lik'd in play-house all the year.

Yet since each mind betrays a diff'rent taste,
And ev'ry dish scarce pleases ev'ry guest,
If aught you relish, do not damn the rest.
This favor crav'd, up let the music strike:
You're welcome all—now fall to where you like.

§ 17. Prologue on the proposed Union of the Two Houses. 1703. FARQUHAR.

Now all the world's ta'en up with state affairs,
Some wishing peace, some calling out for wars,
'Tis likewise fit we should inform the age,
What are the present politics o' th' stage:
Two diff'rent states, ambitious both, and bold,
All free-born souls, the New House and the Old,
Have long contended, and made stout essays,
Which should be monarch absolute in plays.
Long has the battle held with bloody strife,
Where many ranting heroes lost their life;
Yet such their enmity, that e'en the slain
Do conquer death, rise up, and fight again.

Whilst from the gallery, box, the pit, and all,
The audience look'd, and shook its awful head,
Wond'ring to see so many thousands fall,

And then look'd pale to see us look so red.
For force of numbers, and poetic spell,
We've rais'd the ancient heroes too from hell,
To lead our troops; and on this bloody field
You've seen great Cæsar fight, great Pompey yield.

Vast sums of treasure too we did advance,
To draw some mercenary troops from France;
Light-footed rogues, who, when they got their
pay,

Took to their heels—Allons—and ran away.
Here you have seen great Philip's conqu'ring son,
Who in twelve years did the whole world o'errun;
Here has he fought, and found a harder job
To beat one play-house, than subdue the globe;
All this from emulation for the bays:

You lik'd the contest, and bestow'd your praise,
But now (as busy heads love something new)
They would propose an union—O mort dieu!
If it be so, let Cæsar hide his head,
And fight no more for glory, but for bread.

Let Alexander mourn, as once before,
Because no worlds are left to conquer more.
But if we may judge small from greater things,
The present times may show what union brings,
You feel the danger of united kings.

If we grow one, then slav'ry must ensue
To poets, players, and, my friends, to you:
For, to one house confin'd, you then must praise
Both cursed actors, and confounded plays.
Then leave us as we are, and next advance
Bravely to break the tie 'twixt Spain and France.

§ 18. Prologue to Love's Contrivance. 1703.
CENTLIVRE.

POETS like mushrooms rise and fall of late,
Or as the uncertain favorites of state;
Invention's rack'd to please both eye and ear,
But no scene takes without the moving play'r:
Daily we see plays, pamphlets, libels, rhymes,
Become the falling-sickness of the times;
So fev'rish is the humor of the town,
It surfeits of a play ere three days' run.
At Locket's, Browne's, and at Pontack's, inquire
What modish kick-shaws the nice beaux desire,
What fam'd ragouts, what new-invented salad,
Has best pretensions to regale the palate.
If we present you with a medley here,
A hodge-podge dish serv'd up in china ware,
We hope 'twill please, 'cause, like your bill of fare,
To please you all we should attempt in vain:
In diff'rent persons diff'rent humors reign.
The soldier's for the rattling scenes of war,
The peaceful beau hates shedding blood so near.
Courtiers in comedy place their chief delight,
'Cause love's the proper business of the night.
The clown for past'ral his half-crown bestows,
But t'other house by sad experience knows,
This polish'd town produces few of those.
The merchant is for traffic ev'ry where,
And values not the best, but cheapest ware.
Since various humors are pleas'd various ways,
A critic's but a fool to judge of plays.
Fool, did I say? 'Tis difficult to know
Who 'tis that's so indeed, or is not so:
If that be then a point so hard to gain,
Wit's sure a most profound unfathom'd main.
He that sits judge, the trident ought to sway,
To know who's greatest fool or wit to-day,
The audience, or the author of the play.

§ 19. Epilogue to the Beau's Duel. 1703.
CENTLIVRE.

YOU see, gallants, 't has been our poet's care,
To show what beaux in their perfection are;
By nature cowards, foolish; useless tools,
Made men by tailors, and by women, fools:
A fickle, false, a singing, dancing crew;
Nay, now we hear they've smiling-master o.
Just now a Frenchman, in the dressing-room,
From teaching of a beau to smile, was come.
He show'd five guineas—Wasn't he rarely paid?
Thus all the world by smiles are once betray'd.
The statesman smiles on them he would undo,
The courtier's smiles are very seldom true,
The lover's smiles too many do believe,
And women smile on them they would deceive.
When tradesmen smile, they safely cheat with
ease;
And smiling lawyers never fail of fees.
The doctor's look the patient's pains beguiles,
The sick man lives if the physician smiles.
Thus smiles with interest hand in hand do go,
He surest strikes, that smiling gives the blow.
Poets, with us, this proverb do defy:
We live by smiles, for if you frown we die.

To please you then shall be our chief endeavour
And all we ask is but your smiles for ever.

[Going.]

Hold—I forgot—the author bid me say,
She humbly begs protection for her play:
'Tis yours—she dedicates it to you all,
And you're too gen'rous, sure, to let it fall;
She hopes the ladies will her cause maintain,
Since virtue here has been her only aim.
The beaux, she thinks, won't fail to do her right, Since here they're taught with safety how to fight.

She's sure of favor from the men of war,
A soldier is her darling character:
To fear their murmurs then would be absurd,
They only mutiny when not preferr'd.
But yet, I see, she does your fury dread,
And, like a pris'ner, stands with fear half-dead,
While you, her judges, do her sentence give;
If you're not pleas'd, she says, she cannot live.
Let my petition then for once prevail,
And let your gen'rous hands her pardon seal.

§ 20. Prologue to Love makes a Man. 1704.
CIBBER.

SINCE plays are but a kind of public feasts,
Where tickets only make the welcome guests;
Methinks, instead of grace, we should prepare
Your tastes in prologue, with your bill of fare.
When you foreknow each course, though this may tease you,

'Tis five to one but one o' th' five may please you.
First, for the critics, we've your darling cheer,
Faults without number, more than sense can bear;
You're certain to be pleas'd where errors are.
From your displeasure I dare vouch we're safe;
You never frown but where your neighbours
laugh.

Now, you that never know what spleen or hate is,
Who for an act or two are welcome gratis,
That tip the wink, and so sneak out with nun-
quam satis;

For your smart tastes we've toss'd you up a fop,
We hope the newest that's of late come up;
The fool, beau, wit, and rake, so mix'd he carries,
He seems a ragout piping-hot from Paris.
But, for the softer sex, whom most we'd move,
We've what the fair and chaste were form'd
for—love:

An artless passion, fraught with hopes and fears,
And nearest happy when it most despairs.
For masks, we've scandal, and for beaux,
French airs.

To please all tastes, we'll do the best we can;
For the galleries, we've Dicky and Will Pin-
kethman. [fare;

Now, sirs, you're welcome, and you know your
But pray, in charity, the founder spare,
Lest you destroy at once the poet and the play'r.

§ 21. Prologue to the Twin Rivals. 1706.
FARQUHAR.

[An alarm sounded.]

WITH drums and trumpets, in this warring age,
A martial prologue should alarm the stage.

New plays—ere acted, a full audience here,
Seem towns invested, when a siege they fear.
Prologues are like a forlorn hope, sent out
Before the play, to skirmish and to scout:
Our dreadful foes, the critics, when they spy,
They cock, they charge, they fire—then back they fly.

The siege is laid—there gallant chiefs abound,
Here—foes intrench'd, there—glitt'ring troops
around,

And the loud batt'ries roar—from yonder rising ground.

In the first act, brisk sallies (miss or hit),
With volleys of small shot, or snip-snap wit,
Attack, and gall the trenches of the pit.

The next—the fire continues, but at length
Grows less, and slackens like a bridegroom's strength.

The third—feints, mines, and countermines,
abound ;

Your critic engineers, safe under ground,
Blow up our works, and all our art confound.

The fourth—brings on most action, and 'tis sharp,

Fresh foes crowd on, at your remissness carp,
And desp'rate, though unskill'd, insult our counterscarp.

Then comes the last; the gen'ral storm is near,
The poet-governor now quakes for fear;
Runs wildly up and down, forgets to huff,
And would give all he's plunder'd—to get off.
So—Don, and Monsieur—Bluff, before the siege,

Were quickly tam'd—at Venlo, and at Liege:
'Twas Viva Spagnia! Viva France! before;
Now, Quartier, Monsieur! Quartier! Ah,
Senor!

But what your resolution can withstand?
You master all, and awe the sea and land.
In war—your valor makes the strong submit;
Your judgement humbles all attempts in wit.
What play, what fort, what beauty, can endure
All fierce assaults, and always be secure?
Then grant 'em gen'rous terms who dare to write,
Since now—that seems as desp'rate as to fight.
If we must yield—yet, ere the day be fix'd,
Let us hold out the third, and, if we may, the sixth.

§ 22. Prologue to the Basset-Table. 1706.
Spoken by Mr. Pinkethman. CENTLIVRE.

IN all the faces that to plays resort,
Whether of country, city, mob, or court,
I've always found, that none such hopes inspire
As you, dear brethren of the upper tier.
Poets in prologues may both preach and rail,
Yet all their wisdom nothing will avail; [fail.
Who writes not up to you, 'tis ten to one will
Your thund'ring plaudit 'tis that deals out fame;
You make plays run, though of themselves but lame. [manding,
How often have we known your noise com-
Impose on your inferior masters' understanding!
Therefore, dear brethren, since I'm one of you,
Whether adorn'd in grey, green, brown, or blue,
This day stand all by me, as I will fall by you.

And now let—

The poor pit see how Pinkey's voice commands:
Silence—Now rattle all your sticks, and clap your grimy hands.

I greet your love, and let the vainest author
show

Half this command on cleaner hands below:
Nay more, to prove your interest, let this play
live by you.

So may you share good claret with your masters,
Still free in your amours from their disasters;
Free from poor] house-keeping, where peck is under locks ;

Free from cold kitchens, and no Christmas-box;
So may no long debates i' th' House of Commons
Make you i' th' lobby starve, when hunger summons ;

But may your plenteous vails come flowing in,
Give you a lucky hit, and make you gentlemen:
And, thus prefer'd, ne'er fear the world's re-
proaches,

But shake your elbows with my lord, and keep your coaches.

§ 23. Prologue to the Busybody. 1708.
CENTLIVRE.

THOUGH modern prophets were expos'd of
late,

The author could not prophesy his fate:
If with such scenes an audience had been fir'd,
The poet must have really been inspir'd.
But these, alas! are melancholy days
For modern prophets, and for modern plays.
Yet since prophetic lies please fools of fashion,
And women are so fond of agitation;
To men of sense I'll prophesy anew,
And tell you wondrous things that will prove
Undaunted colonels will to camps repair, [true.
Assur'd there'll be no skirmishes this year;
On our own terms will flow the wish'd-for peace,
All wars, except 'twixt man and wife, shall cease.
The Grand Monarque may wish his son a throne,
But hardly will advance to lose his own.
This season most things bear a smiling face;
But play'rs in summer have a dismal case,
Since your appearance only is our act of grace.
Court-ladies will to country seats be gone,
My lord can't all the year live great in town:
Where wanting operas, basset, and a play,
They'll sigh, and stitch a gown to pass the time
away.

Gay city-wives at Tunbridge will appear,
Whose husbands long have wished for an heir;
Where many a courtier may their wants relieve,
But by the waters only they conceive.
The Fleet-street sempstress, toast of Temple
sparks, [clerks,
That runs spruce neckcloths for attorneys'
At Cuper's gardens will her hours regale,
Sing Fair Dorinda, and drink bottled ale.
At all assemblies rakes are up and down,
And gamesters, when they think they are not known.

Should I denounce our author's fate to-day,
To cry down prophecies, you'd damn the play;

Yet whims like these have sometimes made you
laugh,

'Tis tattling all like Isaac Bickerstaff.
Since war and places claim the bards that write,
Be kind, and bear a woman's treat to-night;
Let your indulgence all her fears allay,
And none but woman-haters damn this play.

§ 24. Prologue to The Man's Bewitch'd. 1710.
CENTLIVRE.

OUR female author trembling stands within,
Her fear arises from another's sin:
One of her sex has so abus'd the town,
That on her score she dreads your angry frown;
Though I dare say, poor soul, she never writ
Lampoon, or satire, on the box or pit;
A harmless hum'rous play is her extent of wit.
Though Bickerstaff's vast genius may engage,
And lash the vice and follies of the age;
Why should the tender Delia tax the nation,
Stickle and make a noise for reformation,
Who always gave a loose herself to inclination?
Scandal and satire's thrown aside to-day,
And humor's the sole business of our play.
Beaux may dress on, to catch the ladies' hearts,
And good assurance pass for mighty parts:
The cits may bring their spouses without fear;
We show no wife that's poaching for an heir,
Nor teach the use of fine gauze handkerchier.
Cowards may huff, and talk of mighty wonders,
And jilts set up—for twenty-thousand-pounders.
Our author, even though she knows full well,
Is so good-natur'd, she forbears to tell,
What colonels, lately, have found out the knack
To muster madam, still, by Ned or Jack;
To keep their pleasures up, a frugal way,
They give her—subaltern's subsistence for her
pay.

In short, whate'er your darling vices are,
They pass untouch'd in this night's bill of fare.
But if all this can't your good-nature wake,
Though here and there a scene should fail to Yet spare her for the Busybody's sake. [take,

§ 25. Epilogue to the same. Spoken by Mrs.
Oldfield. 1710. CENTLIVRE.

[A Porter delivers a Letter, just as she is going to speak.

WHAT'S this? a billet-doux from hands unknown?

'Tis new to send it thus 'fore all the town:
But since the poor man's so agog,
I'll read it out, by way of epilogue.

[Reads.

Madam,
Permit a wretch to let you know,
That he's no more in statu quo;
My ruin from this night commences,
Unless your smiles refund my senses;
For, with one thrust of Cupid's dart,
You've whipp'd your slave quite through
the heart:
Therefore, I beg you, cast your eye
O'er boxes, pit, and gallery,

In pity of my pains and doubt,
And try if you can't find me out.

Poor soul! he seems indeed in dismal plight;
Let's see! it can't be, sure, from th' upper flight,
No, no—that's plain—for—none of them can
Nor can I think it from the middle fell, [write:
For I'm afraid as few of them can spell;
Beside, their haggling passions never gain
Beyond the passage-walking nymphs of Drury-lane:

[rovers,
And then the pit's more stock'd with rakes and
Than any of these senseless, whining lovers.
The backs o' th' boxes too seem mostly lin'd
With souls whose passion's to themselves con-
fin'd.

In short, I can't perceive, 'mongst all your sparks,
The wretch distinguish'd by these bloody marks:

[mands, sir,
But since the town has heard your kind com-
The town shall e'en be witness of my answer.
First then, beware you prove no spark in red,
With empty purse and regimental head;
That thinks no woman can refuse t'engage in't,
While love's advanc'd with offer'd bills on agent;

[ing,
That swears he'll settle from his joys commenc-
And make the babe, the day he's born, an en-
Nor could I bear a titled beau, that steals [sign.
From fasting spouse her matrimonial meals;
That modish sends next morn to her apartment
A civil how d'ye—far, alas! from th' heart
meant:

Then powder'd for th' ensuing day's delights,
Bows through his crowd of duns, and drives to White's.

Nor could I like the wretch that all night plays,
And only takes his rest on winning days;
Then sets up, from a lucky hit, his rattler;
Then's trac'd from his orig'nal—in the Tatler.
To tell you all that are my fix'd aversion,
Would tire the tongue of malice or aspersion:
But if I find 'mongst all one gen'rous heart,
That, deaf to stories, takes the stage's part;
That thinks that purse deserves to keep the plays,
Whose fortune's bound for the support of operas;
That thinks our constitution here is justly fix'd,
And now no more with lawyers' brawls perplex'd;

He, I declare, shall my whole heart receive;
And (what's more strange) I'll love him while
I live.

§ 26. Prologue to Cato. 1713. POPE.

To wake the soul by tender strokes of art,
To raise the genius, and to mend the heart;
To make mankind, in conscious virtue bold,
Live o'er each scene, and be what they behold:
For this the tragic musé first trod the stage,
Commanding tears to stream through ev'ry age;
Tyrants no more their savage nature kept,
And foes to virtue wonder'd how they wept.

Our author shuns by vulgar springs to move
The hero's glory, or the virgin's love;
In pitying love, we but our weakness show,
And wild ambition well deserves its woe.

Here tears shall flow from a more gen'rous cause,
 Such tears as patriots shed for dying laws:
 He bids your breasts with ancient ardor rise,
 And calls forth Roman drops from British eyes.
 Virtue confess'd in human shape he draws,
 What Plato thought, and godlike Cato was:
 No common object to your sight displays,
 But what with pleasure Heaven itself surveys,
 A brave man struggling in the storms of fate,
 And greatly falling with a falling state.
 While Cato gives his little senate laws,
 What bosom beats not in his country's cause?
 Who sees him act, but envies ev'ry deed?
 Who hears him groan, and does not wish to bleed?

[cars,
 Even when proud Cæsar, 'midst triumphal
 The spoils of nations, and the pomp of wars,
 Ignobly vain, and impotently great,
 Show'd Rome her Cato's figure drawn in state:
 As her dead father's rev'rend image pass'd,
 The pomp was darken'd, and the day o'ercast;
 The triumph ceas'd, tears gush'd from ev'ry eye;
 The world's great victor pass'd unheeded by;
 Her last good man dejected Rome ador'd,
 And honor'd Cæsar's less than Cato's sword.

Britons, attend; be worth like this approv'd,
 And show you have the virtue to be mov'd.
 With honest scorn the first fam'd Cato view'd Rome learning arts from Greece, whom she subdued:

Our scene precariously subsists too long
 On French translation, and Italian song.
 Dare to have sense yourselves; assert the stage,
 Be justly warm'd with your own native rage:
 Such plays alone should please a British ear,
 As Cato's self had not disdain'd to hear.

§ 27. Prologue to Lady Jane Grey. 1715.
 ROWE.

TO-NIGHT the noblest subject swells our
 scene,
 A heroine, a martyr, and a queen;
 And though the poet dares not boast his art,
 The very theme shall something great impart,
 To warm the gen'rous soul, and touch the tender heart.

To you, fair judges, we the cause submit;
 Your eyes shall tell us how the tale is writ.
 If your soft pity waits upon our woe,
 If silent tears for suff'ring virtue flow;
 Your grief the muses' labor shall confess,
 The lively passions, and the just distress.
 O! could our author's pencil justly paint,
 Such as she was in life, the beauteous saint;
 Boldly your strict attention might we claim,
 And bid you mark and copy out the dame.
 No wand'ring glance one wanton thought con-
 fess'd;
 No guilty wish inflam'd her spotless breast:
 The only love that warm'd her blooming youth,
 Was husband, England, liberty, and truth.

For these she fell; while, with too weak a hand,
 She strove to save a blind ungrateful land.
 But thus the secret laws of fate ordain,
 William's great hand was doom'd to break that
 chain,

And end the hopes of Rome's tyrannic reign.
 For ever as the circling years return,
 Ye grateful Britons! crown the hero's urn;
 To his just care you ev'ry blessing owe,
 Which or his own, or following reigns bestow;
 Though his hard fate a father's name denied,
 To you a father, he that loss supplied.
 Then while you view the royal line's increase,
 And count the pledges of your future peace,
 From this great stock while still new glories
 Conquest abroad, and liberty at home; [come,
 While you behold the beautiful and brave,
 Bright princesses to grace you, kings to save,
 Enjoy the gift, but bless the hand that gave.

§ 28. Epilogue to the Cruel Gift. Spoken by Mrs. Oldfield. 1717. ROWE.

WELL, 'twas a narrow'scape my lover made—
 That cup and message—I was sore afraid!
 Was that a present for a new-made widow,
 All in her dismal dumps, like doleful Dido?
 When one peep'd in—and hop'd for something
 good,

There was—O gad! a nasty heart and blood*.
 If the old man had show'd himself a father,
 His bowl should have inclos'd a cordial rather;
 Something to cheer me up amidst my trance,
L'eau de Barbude—or comfortable Nantz†.
 He thought he paid it off with being smart,
 And, to be witty, cried, he'd send the heart.
 I could have told his gravity, moreover,
 Were I our sex's secrets to discover,
 'Tis what we never look for in a lover.

Let but the bridegroom prudently provide
 All other matters fitting for a bride,
 So he make good the jewels and the jointure,
 To miss the heart does seldom disappoint her.
 'Faith, for the fashion hearts of late are made in,
 They are the vilest bauble we can trade in.
 Where are the tough brave Britons to be found,
 With hearts of oak, so much of old renown'd?
 How many worthy gentlemen of late
 Swore to be true to mother-church and state;
 When their false hearts were secretly maintaining

Yon trim king Pepin, at Avignon reigning?
 Shame on the canting crew of soul-insurers,
 That Tyburn tribe of speech-making nonjurors,
 Who, in new-fangled terms old truths explaining, meaning!
 Teach honest Englishmen damn'd double-
 O! would you lost integrity restore,
 And boast that faith your plain forefathers bore;
 What surer pattern can you hope to find
 Than that dear pledge‡ your monarch left behind?

* This tragedy was founded upon the story of Sigismunda and Guiscardo, out of Boccace's novels; wherein the heart of the lover is sent by the father to his daughter, as a present.

† i. e. Citron-water and good brandy.

‡ The Prince of Wales, then present.

See how his looks his honest heart explain,
And speak the blessings of his future reign!
In his each feature truth and candor trace,
And read plain-dealing written in his face.

§ 29. Epilogue to the Pseudolus of Plautus.
Acted by the Scholars of Bury School, Nov.
6, 1734.

I HAVE been peeping for these many days
I' th' tail of all the Greek and Latin plays,
And, after strictest search, to none can find
An epilogue, like dishclout, pinn'd behind.
Those ancient bards knew when the play was
done,

Nor, like Sir Martin Mar-all, still play'd on;
They imitated nature in their plan,
Nor made a monkey when they meant a man.
From modern fancy then this custom rose,
Like whimsical toupees among the beaux:
Monstrous excrescences! both which disgrace
(By being fix'd in an improper place)

Heaven's great production, man; man's great production, plays.

Yet must we, though as foolish we decry
This mode, be fools in fashion, and comply;
For rights, we know, howe'er absurdly gain'd
At first, with obstinacy are maintain'd:
Since then this privilege you will not lose,
Let's hear what sort of epilogue you'll choose.
Are you for satire? No; why there you're right;
The wisest can't foresee where that may light.
Are ye for politics? There we cry, No,
Where that may light—you easily may know.
Another topic then, pray, ladies, hear;
Suppose a panegyric on the fair.
So, I perceive, I've touch'd the ticklish place;
And clearly read consent in ev'ry face.
O fie! consent so soon? that can't be right;
I hate such coming ladies—so good night.

§ 30. Epilogue to the Lying Valet. 1740.
GARRICK.

THAT I'm a lying rogue you all agree; [see,
And yet, look round the world, and you shall
That many more, my betters, lie as fast as me.
Against this vice we all are ever railing,
And yet, so tempting is it, so prevailing,
You'll find but few without this useful failing.
Lady or Abigail, my Lord or Will,
The lie goes round, and the ball's never still.
My lies were harmless, told to show my parts,
And not like those when tongues belie their hearts.

In all professions you will find this flaw;
And in the gravest too, in physic and in law.
The gouty sergeant cries, with formal pause,
“Your plea is good, my friend, don't starve
the cause:”

But when my lord decrees for t'other side,
Your costs of suit convince you—that he lied.
A doctor comes, with formal wig and face,
First feels your pulse, then thinks, and knows your case,

“Your fever's slight, not dangerous, I assure you; [cure you.”

Keep warm, and repetatur haustus, Sir, will
Around the bed, next day, his friends are crying;
The patient dies; the doctor's paid for lying.

The poet, willing to secure the pit,
Gives out, his play has humor, taste, and wit:
The cause comes on, and while the judges try,
Each groan and cat-call gives the bard the lie.
Now let us ask, pray, what the ladies do:
They too will fib a little, entre nous.

“Lord!” says the prude (her face behind her
“How can our sex have any joy in man? [fan)
As for my part, the best could ne'er deceive me;
And were the race extinct, 'twould never grieve me!

Their sight is odious, but their touch, O gad!
The thought of that's enough to drive one mad.”
Thus rails at men the squeamish Lady Dainty,
Yet weds at fifty-five a rake of twenty.

In short, a beau's intrigues, a lover's sighs,
The courtier's promise, the rich widow's cries,
And patriot's zeal, are seldom more than lies.
Sometimes you'll see a man belie his nation,
Nor to his country show the least relation.

For instance, now——

A cleanly Dutchman, or a Frenchman grave,
A sober German, or a Spaniard brave,
An Englishman, a coward or a slave.

Mine, though a fibbing, was an honest art;
I serv'd my master, play'd a faithful part:
Rank me not, therefore, 'mongst the lying crew,
For though my tongue was false, my heart was
true.

§ 31. Epilogue to Ignoramus, acted at West- minster School in December 1747. Spoken
by Ignoramus and Musæus.

Ign. PEACE, bookworm! bless me, what a clerk have I!

A strange place, sure—this university!
What's learning, virtue, modesty, or sense?
Fine words to hear—but will they turn the pence?
These stiff pedantic notions—far outweighs
That one short, comprehensive thing—a face.
Go, match it if you can with all your rules
Of Greek or Roman, old or modern schools:
The total this of Ignoramus' skill,
To carve his fortune—place him where you will.
For not in law alone could I appear;
My parts would shine alike in any sphere.

You've heard my song in Rosabella's praise:
You'll see me soon—a rival for the bays.

Or, I could turn a journalist, and write
With little wit, but large recruits of spite:
Abuse and blacken—just as party sways——
And lash my betters—these are thriving ways.

My mind to graver physic would I bend,
Think you I'd study Greek, like Mead or Friend?
No—with some nostrum I'd ensure my fees,
Without the help of learning or degrees:
On drop or pill securely I'd rely,
And shake my head at the whole faculty.
Or would I take to orders——

Mus. Orders; how?

Ign. One not too scrupulous a way might know :

'Twere but the forging of a hand—or so.
In orders too my purposes I'd serve ;
And if I could not rise, I would not starve.
With lungs and face I'd make my butchers
Or publish—that I'd marry at May-fair. [stare, These, these are maxims, that will stand the test :

Both universities—are all a jest.

Mus. I grant, a prodigy we sometimes view,
Whom neither of our seats of learning knew.
Yet sure none shine more eminently great,
In law or physic, in the church or state,
Than those who early drank the love of fame
At Cam's fair bank, or Isis' silver stream.
Look round—here's proof enough this point to clear.

Ign. Bless me!—what ;—not one Ignoramus here?

I stand convicted—what can I say more?
See, my face fails, which never fail'd before.
How great soe'er I seem in Dulman's eye, [by.
Yet Ignorance must blush—when Learning's

§ 32. Epilogue to Agamemnon. THOMSON.

OUR bard, to modern epilogue a foe,
Thinks such mean mirth but deadens gen'rous
woe ;

Dispels in idle air the moral sigh,
And wipes the tender tear from pity's eye :
No more with social warmth the bosom burns ;
But all th' unfeeling, selfish man returns.

Thus he began : and you approv'd the strain,
Till the next couplet sunk to light and vain.
You check'd him there—to you, to reason, just,
He owns he triumph'd in your kind disgust.
Charm'd by your frown, by your displeasure
grac'd,

He hails the rising virtue of your taste.
Wide will its influences spread, as soon as known ;
Truth, to be lov'd, need only to be shown.
Confirm it, once, the fashion to be good
(Since fashion leads the fool, and awes the rude)
No petulance shall wound the public ear ;
No hand applaud what honor shuns to hear ;
No painful blush the modest cheek shall stain ;
The worthy breast shall heave with no disdain.
Chastis'd to decency, the British stage
Shall oft invite the fair, invite the sage : [part ;
Both shall attend well pleas'd, well pleas'd de-
Or, if they doom the verse, absolve the heart.

§ 33. Prologue spoken by Mr. Garrick at the opening of the Theatre in Drury-lane, in the Year 1747. JOHNSON.

WHEN Learning's triumph o'er her barb'rous
foes
First rear'd the stage, immortal Shakspeare rose ;
Each change of many-color'd life he drew,
Exhausted worlds, and then imagin'd new :

Existence saw him spurn her bounded reign,
And panting Time toil'd after him in vain :
His pow'rful strokes presiding Truth impress'd,
And unresisted Passion storm'd the breast.

Then Jonson came, instructed from the school,
To please in method, and invent by rule :
His studious patience, and laborious art,
By regular approach assay'd the heart :
Cold approbation gave the ling'ring bays ;
For those who durst not censure scarce could praise.

A mortal born, he met the gen'ral doom,
But left, like Egypt's kings, a lasting tomb.

The wits of Charles found easier ways to fame,

Nor wish'd for Jonson's art, nor Shakspeare's
flame ;

Themselves they studied, as they felt they writ ;
Intrigue was plot, obscenity was wit.

Vice always found a sympathetic friend ;
They pleas'd their age, but did not aim to mend.

Yet bards like these aspir'd to lasting praise,
And proudly hop'd to pimp in future days :
Their cause was gen'ral, their supports were
strong,

Their slaves were willing, and their reign was long ;

Till shame regain'd the post that sense betray'd,
And virtue call'd oblivion to her aid.

Then crush'd by rules, and weaken'd as re-
fin'd,

For years the pow'r of Tragedy declin'd :
From bard to bard the frigid caution crept,
Till declamation roar'd whilst passion slept ;
Yet still did virtue deign the stage to tread,
Philosophy remain'd, though nature fled.
But forc'd at length her ancient reign to quit,
She saw great Faustus lay the ghost of wit :
Exulting Folly hail'd the joyful day,
And Pantomime and Song confirm'd her sway.

But who the coming changes can presage,
And mark the future periods of the stage ?
Perhaps, if skill could distant times explore,
New Behns, new Durfeys, yet remain in store ;
Perhaps, where Lear has rav'd, and Hamlet
died,

On flying cars new sorcerers may ride ;
Perhaps (for who can guess th' effects of chance?)

Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet may dance.

Hard is his lot that, here by fortune plac'd,
Must watch the wild vicissitudes of taste ;
With every meteor of caprice must play,
And chase the new-born bubble of the day.

Ah ! let not censure term our fate our choice,
The stage but echoes back the public voice ;
The Drama's laws the Drama's patrons give,
For we that live to please, must please to live.

Then prompt no more the follies you decry,
As tyrants doom their tools of guilt to die ;
'Tis yours this night to bid the reign commence
Of rescued nature, and reviving sense ; [show,
To chase the charms of sound, the pomp of
For useful mirth and salutary woe ;
Bid Scenic Virtue form the rising age,
And Truth diffuse her radiance from the Stage.

§ 34. Epilogue to Shakspeare's First Part of King Henry IV. Spoken by Mr. J. Y. in the Character of Falstaff, 1748. Acted by young Gentlemen at Mr. Newcome's School at Hackney. HOADLEY.

[Push'd in upon the Stage by Prince Henry.]

A PLAGUE upon all cowards, still I say—
Old Jack must bear the heat of all the day,
And be the master-fool beyond the play—
Amidst hot-blooded Hotspur's rebel strife,
By miracle of wit I sav'd my life;
And now stand foolishly expos'd again
To th' hissing bullets of the critic's brain.

Go to, old lad, 'tis time that thou wert wiser—
Thou art not fram'd for an epiloguizer.
There's Hal, now, or his nimble shadow, Poins,
Straight in the back, and lissome in the loins,
Who wears his boot smooth as his mistress' skin,
And shining as the glass she dresses in;
Can bow and cringe, fawn, flatter, cog, and lie—
Which honest Jack could never do—not I.
Hal's heir-apparent face might stand it buff,
And make (ha! ha! ha!) a saucy epilogue enough.

But I am old and stiff—nay, bashful grown,
For Shakspeare's humor is not now my own.
I feel myself a counterfeiting ass;
And if for sterling wit I give you brass,
It is his royal image makes it pass.
Fancy now works; and here I stand and stew
In mine own greasy fears, which set to view
Eleven buckram critics in each man of you;
Wights, who with no out-facings will be shamm'd,
Nor into risibility be bamm'd, [treason,
Will, tho' she shake their sides, think Nature
And see one damn'd—ere laugh without a reason. [speed,

Then how shall one, not of the virtuous,
Who merely has a wicked wit to plead—
Wit without measure, humor without rule,
Unfetter'd laugh, and lawless ridicule?
Faith! try him by his peers, a jury chosen—
The kingdom will, I think, scarce raise the dozen.

So—be but kind, and countenance the cheat,
I'll in, and say to Hal, I've done the feat.

§ 35. Prologue to Irene. 1749. JOHNSON.

YE glitt'ring train! whom lace and velvet bless,
Suspend the soft solitudes of dress;
From grov'ling business and superfluous care,
Ye sons of Avarice! a moment spare:
Vot'ries of Fame, and worshippers of Pow'r!
Dismiss the pleasing phantoms for an hour.
Our daring bard, with spirit unconfin'd,
Spreads wide the mighty moral of mankind.
Learn here how Heaven supports the virtuous
mind,
Daring, tho' calm; and vig'rous, tho' resign'd.
Learn here what anguish racks the guilty breast,
In pow'r dependent, in success deprest,

Learn here that peace from innocence must
flow;

All else is empty sound, and idle show. [join;
But truths like these with pleasing language
Ennobled, yet unchang'd, if Nature shine:
If no wild draught depart from Reason's rules,
Nor gods his heroes, nor his lovers fools;
Intriguing wits! his artless plot forgive;
And spare him, beauties! tho' his lovers live.

Be this at least his praise, be this his pride;
To force applause no modern arts are tried.
Should partial cat-calls all his hopes confound,
He bids no trumpet quell the fatal sound;
Should welcome sleep relieve the weary wit,
He rolls not thunders o'er the drowsy pit;
No snares to captivate the judgment spreads;
Nor bribes your eyes to prejudice your heads.
Unmov'd tho' wittings sneer, and rivals rail;
Studious to please, yet not asham'd to fail,
Hescorns the meek address, the suppliant strain,
With merit needless, and without it vain.
In Reason, Nature, Truth, he dares to trust;
Ye fops, be silent; and ye wits, be just.

§ 36. Prologue to Comus, for the Benefit of Milton's Grand-daughter. 1750. Spoken by Mr. GARRICK. JOHNSON.

YE patriot crowds who burn for England's fame, [name,
Ye nymphs whose bosoms beat at Milton's
Whose gen'rous zeal, unbought by flatt'ring rhymes,
Shames the mean pensions of Augustan times;
Immortal patrons of succeeding days,
Attend this prelude of perpetual praise;
Let wit, condemn'd the feeble war to wage
With close malevolence, or public rage;
Let study, worn with virtue's fruitless lore;
Behold this Theatre, and grieve no more. [tell
This night, distinguish'd by your smiles, shall
That never Briton can in vain excel;
The slighted Arts futurity shall trust,
And rising ages hasten to be just.

At length our mighty bard's victorious lays
Fill the loud voice of universal praise;
And baffled spite, with hopeless anguish dumb,
Yields to renown the centuries to come;
With ardent haste each candidate of fame
Ambitious catches at his tow'ring name;
He sees, and pitying sees, vain wealth bestow
Those pageant honors which he scorn'd below,
While crowds aloft the laureat bust behold,
Or trace his form on circulating gold.
Unknown, unheeded, long his offspring lay,
And want hung threat'ning o'er her slow decay.
What tho' she shine with no Miltonian fire,
No fav'ring muse her morning dreams inspire,
Yet softer claims the melting heart engage,
Her youth laborious, and her blameless age;
Hers the mild merits of domestic life,
The patient sufferer, and the faithful wife.
Thus grac'd with humble virtue's native charms,
Her Grandsire leaves her in Britannia's arms;
Secure with peace, with competence, to dwell,
While tutelary nations guard her cell.

Yours is the charge, ye fair, ye wise, ye brave!
'Tis yours to crown desert—beyond the grave.

§ 37. Occasional Prologue, spoken by Mr. Garrick at the opening of Drury-Lane Theatre, September 5, 1750.

As heroes, states, and kingdoms, rise and fall;
So (with the mighty to compare the small)
Thro' int'rest, whim, or, if you please, thro' fate,
We feel commotions in our mimic state:
The sock and buskin fly from stage to stage;
A year's alliance is with us an age!
And where's the wonder? all surprise must cease,

When we reflect how int'rest, or caprice,
Makes real kings break articles of peace.
Strengthen'd with new allies, our foes prepare;
"Cry, Havock! and let slip the dogs of war."
To shake our souls, the papers of the day*
Drew forth the adverse pow'r in dread array;
A pow'r, might strike the boldest with dismay:
Yet, fearless still, we take the field with spirit,
Arm'd cap-a-pie in self-sufficient merit.
Our ladies too, with souls and tongues untam'd,
Fire up like Britons when the battle's nam'd:
Each female heart pants for the glorious strife,
From Hamlet's mother† to the cobbler's wife‡.
Some few there are, whom paltry passions guide,
Desert each day, and fly from side to side:
Others, like Swiss, love fighting as their trade;
For, beat or beating, they must all be paid.
Sacred to Shakspeare was this spot design'd,
To pierce the heart, and humanize the mind:
But if an empty house, the actor's curse,
Shows us our Lears and Hamlets lose their force;
Unwilling we must change the nobler scene,
And, in our turn, present you Harlequin;
Quit poets, and set carpenters to work,
Show gaudy scenes, or mount the vaulting Turk:
For tho' we actors, one and all, agree
Boldly to struggle for our—vanity,
If want comes on, importance must retreat;
Our first great ruling passion is—to eat.
To keep the field, all methods we'll pursue;
The conflict glorious! for we'll fight for you:
And, should we fail to gain the wish'd applause,
At least we're vanquish'd in a noble cause.

§ 38. Occasional Prologue, spoken at Covent-Garden Theatre by Mr. Barry, 1750.

WHEN vice or folly over-runs a state,
Weak politicians lay the blame on fate:

When rulers useful subjects cease to prize,
And damn for arts that caus'd themselves to rise;

When jealousies and fears possess the throne,
And kings allow no merit—but their own;
Can it be strange, that men for flight prepare,
And strive to raise a colony elsewhere?

This custom has prevail'd in ev'ry age,
And has been sometimes practis'd on the stage:
For—entre nous—these managers of merit,
Who fearless arm, and take the field with spirit,
Have curb'd us monarchs with their haughty
mien,

And Herod§ have out Herod-ed—within.

[Pointing to the Green Room.

O, they can torture twenty thousand ways!
Make bouncing Bajazet|| retreat from Bayes¶!
The ladies** too, with every pow'r to charm,
Whose face and fire an anchorite might warm,
Have felt the fury of a tyrant's arm.

By selfish arts expell'd our ancient seat,
In search of candor, and in search of meat,
We from your favor hope for this retreat.

If Shakspeare's passion, or if Jonson's art,
Can fire the fancy, or can warm the heart,
That task be ours; but if you damn their scenes,
And heroes must give way to Harlequins,
We too can have recourse to mime and dance;
Nay, there, I think, we have the better chance:
And, should the town grow weary of the mute,
Why, we'll produce a child upon the flute††.
But, be the food as 'twill, 'tis you that treat!
Long they have feasted—permit us now to eat.

§ 39. Epilogue spoken by Mrs. Clive, on the two occasional Prologues at Covent-Garden and Drury-Lane, 1750:

[Enters hastily, as if speaking to one who would oppose her.

I'LL do't: by Heaven, I will—Pray get you gone;
What! all these janglings, and I not make one?
Was ever woman offer'd so much wrong?
These creatures here would have me hold my tongue!

I'm so provok'd, I hope you will excuse me;
I must be heard—and beg you won't refuse me.
While our mock heroes, not so wise as rash,
With indignation hold the vengeful lash,
And at each other throw alternate squibs,
Compos'd of little wit—and some few fibs;
I Catherine Clive come here to attack 'em all,
And aim alike at little and at tall.
But first, ere with the buskin'd chiefs I brave it,
A story is at hand, and you shall have it.

* In which papers was this paragraph: "We hear that Mr. Quin, Mrs. Cibber, Mr. Barry, Mr. Macklin, and Mrs. Woffington, are engaged at Covent-Garden theatre for the ensuing season."—On the part of Drury-Lane theatre it was notified, "That two celebrated actors from Dublin were engaged to perform there, also Miss Bellamy, and a new actress, Signor Fauson, the comic dancer, and his wife, and a gentleman to sing, who had not been on any stage."

† Mrs. Pritchard.

‡ Mrs. Clive.

§ Mr. Quin.

|| Both Quin and Barry.

¶ Mr. Garrick.

** Mrs. Cibber, &c.

†† A child, said to be about four years of age, had been introduced on the stage of Drury-Lane theatre, to play a tune on that instrument.

Once on a time two boys were throwing dirt,
A gentle youth was one, and one was somewhat pert:

Each to his master with his tale retreated,
Who gravely heard their different parts repeated,
How Tom was rude, and Jack, poor lad! ill-treated.

The master paus'd—to be unjust was loath,
Call'd for a rod, and fairly whipp'd them both.
In the same master's place, lo! here I stand,
And for each culprit hold the lash in hand.
First, for our own—O, 'tis a pretty youth!
But out of fifty lies I'll sift some truth:
'Tis true, he's of a choleric disposition,
And fiery parts make up his composition. [ried!
How have I seen him rave when things miscar-
Indeed he's grown much tamer since he married.
If he succeeds, what joys his fancy strike!
And then he gets—to which he's no dislike.
Faults he has many—but I know no crimes;
Yes, he has one—he contradicts sometimes:
And when he falls into his frantic fit,
He blusters so, it makes e'en me submit.
So much for him—the other youth comes next,
Who shows, by what he says, poor soul! he's vex'd.

He tells you tales how cruelly this treats us,
To make you think the little monster beats us.
Would I have whin'd in melancholy phrase,
How bouncing Bajazet retreats from Bayes?
I, who am woman, would have stood the fray;
At least not snivell'd thus, and run away!
Should any manager lift arm at me,
I have a tyrant arm as well as he!—
In fact, there has some little bouncing been,
But who the bouncer was inquire within.
No matter who—I now proclaim a peace,
And hope henceforth hostilities will cease:
No more shall either rack his brains to tease ye,
But let the contest be—who most shall please ye.

MOORE.

ARE you all ready? here's your music, here! *
Author, sneak off; we'll tickle you, my dear;
The fellow stopp'd me in a hellish fright—
Pray, Sir, said he, must I be damn'd to-night?
Damn'd! Surely, friend—don't hope for our compliance; [fiance.
Zounds, Sir—a second play's downright de-Though once, poor rogue! we pitied your condition,
Here's the true recipe—for repetition.
Well, Sir, says he, ev'n as you please; so then
I'll never trouble you with plays again.
But, hark ye, poet!—won't you though, says I,
'Pon honor?—then we'll damn you, let me die.
Shan't we; my bucks? Let's take him at his word:
Damn him, or, by my soul, he'll write a third.*

* Blowing his cat-call.

The man wants money, I suppose—but, mind
ye,

Tell him—you've left your charity behind ye.
A pretty plea, his wants, to our regard!
As if we bloods had bowels for a bard!
Besides, what men of spirit, now-a-days,
Come to give sober judgements of new plays?
It argues some good-nature to be quiet—
Good-nature!—Aye—but then we lose a riot.
The scribbling fool may beg and make a fuss,
'Tis death to him—What then?—'Tis sport to
us. [jokes,

Don't mind me though—for all my fun and
The bard may find us bloods good-natur'd folks.
No crabbed critics—foes to rising merit—
Write but with fire, and we'll applaud with
Our author aims at no dishonest ends, [spirit.
He knows no enemies and boasts some friends;
He takes no methods down your throats to cram
So, if you like it, save it; if not, damn it. [it:

§ 41. Prologue to Taste. 1752. Spoken in the Character of an Auctioneer. GARRICK.

BEFORE this court I Peter Puff appear,
A Briton born, and bred an auctioneer!
Who, for myself, and eke a hundred others,
My useful, honest, learned, bawling brothers,
With much humility and fear implore ye,
To lay our present desperate case before ye.
'Tis said, this night a certain wag intends
To laugh at us, our calling, and our friends:
If lords and ladies, and such dainty folks,
Are cur'd of auction-hunting by his jokes;
Should this odd doctrine spread throughout the
'Before you buy, be sure to understand;' [land,
O, think on us, what various ills will flow,
When great ones purchase only what they
know!

Why laugh at taste? It is a harmless fashion,
And quite subdues each detrimental passion:
The fair ones' hearts will ne'er incline to man,
While thus they rage for—china and japan.
The virtuoso too, and connoisseur,
Are ever decent, delicate, and pure; [hold,
The smallest hair their looser thoughts might
Just warm when single, and when married cold.
Their blood, at sight of beauty, gently flows;
Their Venus must be old, and want a nose!
No am'rous passion with deep knowledge thrives;

'Tis the complaint, indeed, of all our wives!
'Tis said virtu to such a height is grown,
All artists are encourag'd—but our own.
Be not deceiv'd; I here declare on oath,
I never yet sold goods of foreign growth:
Ne'er sent commissions out to Greece or Rome:
My best antiquities are made at home.
I've Romans, Greeks, Italians, near at hand,
True Britons all, and living in the Strand.
I ne'er for trinkets rack my pericranium;
They furnish out my room from Herculaneum.
But hush—
Should it be known that English are employ'd,
Our manufacture is at once destroy'd;
No matter what our countrymen deserve,
They'll thrive as ancients, but as moderns starve;

If we should fall, to you it will be owing;
Farewell to arts—they are going, going, going!
The fatal hammer's in your hand, O town!
Then set us up, and knock the poet down.

§ 42. Prologue to Cato. Acted in 1753 by the Scholars of the free Grammar School at Derby, for the Benefit of the Orphan of the late Usher. Written by one of the Scholars, aged 16.

No Garrick here majestic treads the stage,
No Quin your whole attention to engage;
No practis'd actor here the scene employs;
But a raw parcel of unskilful boys.
Shall we disfigur'd in a school-boy see
Cato's great soul in base epitome?
Can critics bear such slavery as this?
Would not e'en Cato join the critic's hiss?
What shall we say then? what excuses make?
Our credit and success lie both at stake.

As when some peasant, who, to treat his lord,
Brings out his little stock, and decks his board
With what his ill-stor'd cupboard will afford,
With awkward bows, and ill-plac'd rustic airs,
To make excuses for his feast prepares;
So we, with tremor mix'd with vast delight,
View the bright audience which appears to-
night,

And, conscious of its meanness, hardly dare
To bid you welcome to our homely fare.

But would the ladies in our cause appear,
One look would silence every critic here.
If you but smile, 'twill cheer our tim'rous hearts,
And give us courage to perform our parts.

To you, ye fair ones, then, we make address,
And beg protection for this night's success.
Look gently on our faults, and, where we fail,
Let pity to our tender youth prevail.
Our cause is in your hands; and Cato, who Disdain'd great Cæsar's yoke, submits to you.

§ 43. Prologue to The Fairies. 1755. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK.

[Enter—interrupting the band of music.

A MOMENT stop your tuneful fingers, pray,
While here, as usual, I my duty pay.

[To the audience.

Don't frown, my friends [to the band]; you shall soon melt again;

But, if not there is felt each dying strain,
Poor I shall speak, and you will scrape, in vain.
To see me now, you think the strangest thing!
For, like friend Benedick, I cannot sing:
Yet, in this prologue, cry but you corragio,
I'll speak you both a jig, and an adagio.

A Persian king, as Persian tales relate,
Oft went disguis'd, to hear the people prate;
So, curious I sometimes steal forth incog.
To hear what critics croak of me, King Log.
Three nights ago, I heard a tête-à-tête,
Which fix'd at once our English opera's fate:
One was a youth born here, but flush from Rome;

The other born abroad, but here his home:

And first the English foreigner began,
Who thus address'd the foreign Englishman:
“An English opera! 'tis not to be borne;
“I both my country and their music scorn.
“O, damn their Ally Croakers, and their Early-horn!

“Signior, si—but sons—vors recitativo:
“Il tutto é bestiale e cativo.”

This said, I made my exit full of terrors;
And now ask pardon for the following errors:
Excuse us, first, for foolishly supposing,
Your countrymen could please you in composing;
An opera too!—play'd by an English band,
Wrote in a language which you understand—
I dare not say who wrote it—I could tell ye,
To soften matters—Signor Shakspearelli:
This awkward drama (I confess th' offence)
Is guilty too of poetry and sense:
And then the price we take, you'll all abuse it;
So low, so unlike op'ras—but excuse it;
We'll mend that fault, whenever you shall choose it.

Our last mischance, and worse than all the rest,
Which turns the whole performance to a jest,
Our singers all are well, and all will do their best.
But why would this rash fool, this Englishman,
Attempt an opera?—'tis the strangest plan!

Struck with the wonders of his master's art,
Whose sacred dramas shake and melt the heart,
Whose heaven-born strains the coldest breast
inspire,

Whose chorus-thunder sets the soul on fire!
Inflam'd, astonish'd, at those magic airs,
When Samson groans, and frantic Saul despairs,
The pupil wrote—his work is now before ye,
And waits your stamp of infamy or glory!
Yet, ere his errors and his faults are known,
He says, those faults, those errors, are his own;
If thro' the clouds appear some glimmering rays,
They're sparks he caught from his great master's blaze!

§ 44. Prologue to Virginia. 1754. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK.

PROLOGUES, like compliments, are loss of time,
'Tis penning bows, and making legs, in rhyme:
'Tis cringing at the door, with simp'ring grin,
When we should show the company within—
So thinks our bard, who, stiff in classic knowledge, [lege.—

Preserves too much the buckram of the col-“Lord, Sir,” said I, “an audience must be “woo'd,

“And, lady-like, with flattery pursued;
“They nauseate fellows that are blunt and rude.
“Authors should learn to dance as well as write—”

“Dance at my time of life! Zounds, what a sight!

“Grown gentlemen ('tis advertis'd) do learn by night.

“Your modern prologues, and such whims as these,

“The Greeks ne'er knew—turn, turn to Sophocles.”

“ I read no Greek, Sir—when I was at school,
 “ Terence had prologues—Terence was no fool.”
 “ He had ; but why ? ” replied the bard, in rage :
 “ Exotics, monsters, had possess’d the stage ;
 “ But we have none, in this enlighten’d age !
 “ Your Britons now, from gallery to pit,
 “ Can relish nought but sterling Attic wit.
 “ Here, take my play, I meant it for instruction ;
 “ If rhymes are wanting for its introduction,
 “ E’en let that nonsense be your own production.”

Off went the poet—It is now expedient
 I speak as manager, and your obedient.
 I, as your cat’rer, would provide your dishes,
 Dress’d to your palates, season’d to your wishes.
 Say but you’re tir’d with boil’d and roast at home,
 We too can send for niceties from Rome ;
 To please your tastes will spare nor pains nor money,

Discard sirloins, and get you macaroni.
 Whate’er new gusto for a time may reign,
 Shakspeare and beef must have their turn again.

If novelties can please, to-night we’ve two—
 Tho’ English both, yet spare ’em as they’re new.
 To one, at least, your usual favors show ;
 A female asks it—can a man say No ?
 Should you indulge our novice * yet unseen,
 And crown her, with your hands, a tragic queen ;
 Should you, with smiles, a confidence impart,
 To calm those fears which speak a feeling heart ;
 Assist each struggle of ingenuous shame,
 Which curbs a genius in its road to fame :
 With one wish more her whole ambition ends—
 She hopes some merit, to deserve such friends.

§ 45. Epilogue to the same. 1754. GARRICK.

THE poet’s pen can, like a conjurer’s wand,
 Or kill or raise his heroine at command :
 And I shall, spirit-like, before I sink,
 Not courteously inquire, but tell you, what you think.

From top to bottom I shall make you stare,
 By hitting all your judgements to a hair !

And, first, with you above I shall begin—

[To the upper gallery.]

Good-natur’d souls, they’re ready all to grieve.
 Though twelve pence seat you there, so near
 the ceiling,

The folks below can’t boast a better feeling.
 No high-bred prud’ry in your region lurks,
 You boldly laugh and cry as nature works.

Says John to Tom (aye—there they sit together,
 As honest Britons as e’er trod on leather):

“ ’Tween you and I, my friend, ’tis very vild, “ That old Vergeenus should have struck his child ;

“ I would have hang’d him for’t had I been ruler ;

“ And duck’d that Apus too, by way of cooler.”
 Some maiden-dames, who hold the middle floor,

[To the middle gallery.]

And fly from naughty man, at forty-four,
 With turn’d-up eyes applaud Virginia’s ’scape,
 And vow they’d do the same to shun a rape ;

So very chaste, they live in constant fears,
 And apprehension strengthens with their years.

Ye bucks, who from the pit your terrors send,
 Yet love distressed damsels to befriend ;
 You think this tragic joke too far was carried,
 And wish, to set all right, the maid had married :
 You’d rather see (if so the fates had will’d)
 Ten wives be kind, than one poor virgin kill’d.

May I approach unto the boxes, pray,
 And there search out a judgement on the play ?
 In vain, alas ! I should attempt to find it ;
 Fine ladies see a play, but never mind it.

’Tis vulgar to be mov’d by acted passion,
 Or form opinions till they’re fix’d by fashion.

Our author hopes this fickle goddess, Mode,
 With us will make, at least, nine days’ abode ;
 To present pleasure he contracts his view,
 And leaves his future fame to time and you.

§ 46. Prologue to Barbarossa. 1755. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK, in the Character of a Country Boy.

MEASTER ! measter !

Is not my measter here among you, pray ?
 Nayspeak—my measter wrote this fine new play.
 The actor-folks are making such a clatter !
 They want the pro-log—I know nought o’ the matter :

He must be there among you—look about—
 A weezen pale-fac’d mon—do find him out.
 Pray, measter, come, or all will fall to sheame ;
 Call Mister—hold—I must not tell his neame.

La ! what a crowd is here ! what noise and pother !

Fine lads and lasses ! one o’ top o’ t’other.
 [Pointing to the rows of pit and gallery.]

I could for ever here with wonder gaze ;
 I ne’er saw church so full in all my days !—
 Your servant, Sirs—what do you laugh for, eh ?
 You donna take me sure for one o’ the play ?
 You should not flout an honest country lad—
 You think me fool, and I think you half-mad :
 You’re all as strange as I, and stranger too ;
 And, if you laugh at me, I’ll laugh at you.

[Laughing.]

I donna like your London tricks, not I ;
 And, since you’ve rais’d my blood, I’ll tell you
 why :

And, if you wull, since now I am before ye,
 For want of pro-log, I’ll relate my story.

I came from country here to try my fate,
 And get a place among the rich and great :
 But troth I’m sick o’ th’ journey I ha’ ta’en ;
 I like it not—would I were whoame again !

First, in the city I took up my station,
 And got a place with one o’ th’ corporation ;
 A round big mon—he ate a plaguy deal ;
 Zooks ! he’d have beat five ploomen at a meal !
 But long with him I could not make abode,
 For, could you think ’t ? he ate a great sea-toad ?
 It came from Indies—’twas as big as me ;
 He call’d it belly-patch and cap-a-pie :

La ! how I star’d !—I thought—who knows but I,

* Mrs. Graham, afterwards Mrs. Yates, then a new actress.

For want of monsters, may be made a pie?
Rather than tarry here for bribe or gain,
I'll back to whoame and country-fare again.

I left toad-eater; then I serv'd a lord,
And there they promis'd—but ne'er kept their word.

While 'mong the great this geaming work the trade is,

They mind no more poor servants—than their ladies.

A lady next, who lik'd a smart young lad,
Hir'd me forthwith—but, troth, I thought her mad:

She turn'd the world top-down, as one may say,
She chang'd the day to neet, the neet to day!
I was so sheam'd with all her freakish ways,
She wore her geare so short, so low her stays—
Fine folks show all for nothing now-a-days!

Now I'm the poet's mon—I find with wits
There's nothing sartain—nay, we eat by fits.
Our meals, indeed, are slender—what of that?
There are but three on's—measter, I, and cat.
Did you but see us all, as I'm a sinner,
You'd scarcely say which of the three is thinner.

My wages all depend on this night's piece;
But should you find that all our swans are geese,
'Efeck, I'll trust no more to measter's brain,
But pack up all, and whistle whoame again.

§ 47. Epilogue to the same. 1755. Spoken by Mr. WOODWARD, in the Character of a fine Gentleman. GARRICK.

[Enter—speaking without.

PSHAW! damn your epilogue, and hold your tongue—

Shall we of rank be told what's right and wrong?
Had you ten epilogues you should not speak 'em,
Though he had writ 'em all in linguum Grecum.
I'll do't, by all the gods! (you must excuse me)
Though author, actors, audience, all abuse me!

[To the audience.

Behold a gentleman!—and that's enough!
Laugh if you please—I'll take a pinch of snuff!
I come to tell you (let it not surprise you)
That I'm a wit—and worthy to advise you.
How could you suffer that same country booby,
That pro-log speaking savage, that great looby,
To talk his nonsense?—give me leave to say,
'Twas low! damn'd low; but save the fellow's play:

Let the poor devil eat; allow him that,
And give a meal to measter, mon, and cat;
But why attack the fashions? senseless rogue!
We have no joys but what result from vogue:
The mode should all control!——nay, ev'ry passion,

Sense, appetite, and all, give way to fashion.
I hate as much as he a turtle-feast,
But, till the present turtle-rage is ceas'd,
I'd ride a hundred miles to make myself a beast.
I have no ears; yet operas I adore!

Always prepar'd to die—to sleep—no more!
The ladies too were carp'd at, and their dress,
He wants them all ruff'd up like good queen Bess!

They are, forsooth, too much expos'd and free:
Were more expos'd, no ill effects I see,
For, more or less, 'tis all the same to me.
Poor gaming too was maul'd among the rest,
That precious cordial to a high-life breast!
When thoughts arise, I always game or drink,
An English gentleman should never think—
The reason's plain, which ev'ry soul might hit on—

What trims a Frenchman, oversets a Briton.
In us reflection breeds a sober sadness,
Which always ends in politics or madness:
I therefore now propose, by your command,
That tragedies no more shall cloud this land;
Send o'er your Shakspeares to the sons of France,
Let them grow grave—let us begin to dance!
Banish your gloomy scenes to foreign climes,
Reserve alone, to bless these golden times,
A farce or two—and Woodward's pantomimes.

§ 48. Occasional Prologue to the Mask of Britannia. 1755. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK, in the Character of a Sailor, fuddled, and talking to himself.

Enters, singing, “How pleasant a sailor's life passes!”

WELL! if thou art, my boy, a little mellow,
A sailor, half-seas o'er, 's a pretty fellow.

What cheer, ho? Do I carry too much sail?

[To the pit.

No—tight and trim—I scud before the gale—

[He staggers forward, and then stops.

But softly tho'—the vessel seems to heel—

Steady! my boy—she must not show her keel.

And now, thus ballasted—what course to steer?

Shall I again to sea—and bang Mounseer?

Or stay on shore, and toy with Sall and Sue?

Dost love 'em, boy? By this right hand, I do!

A well-rigg'd girl is surely most inviting:

There's nothing better, faith—save flip and fighting.

I must away—I must—

What! shall we sons of beef and freedom stoop,
Or lower our flag to slavery and soup?

What! shall these Parly-vous make such a racket,

And I not lend a hand to lace their jacket?

Still shall Old England be your Frenchman's butt?—

Whene'er he shuffles we should always cut.

I'll to 'em, faith—Avast—before I go—

Have I not promis'd Sall to see the show?

[Pulls out a play-bill.

From this same paper we shall understand

What work's to-night—I read your printed hand.

First let's refresh a bit—for, faith, I need it—

I'll take one sugar-plum—[takes some tobacco] and then I'll read it.

[He reads the play-bill of Zara, which was acted that evening.

“At the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane—

“Will be presen-ta-ted a tragedy called Sarah—

I'm glad 'tis Sarah—then our Sall may see
Her namesake's tragedy: and as for me,
I'll sleep as sound as if I were at sea,

“To which will be added—a new mask—”
Zounds! why a mask? We sailors hate grimaces;
Aboveboard all; we scorn to hide our faces.
But what is here, so very large and plain?
“Bri-tan-nia.”——O, Britannia!——good
again——

Huzza, boys! By the Royal George, I swear, Tom Coxen, and the crew, shall straight be
there.

All free-born souls must take Bri-tan-nia's part,
And give her three round cheers, with hand
and heart! [Going off, he stops.]

I wish you landmen, though, would leave your tricks,

Your factions, parties, and damn'd politics:
And like us honest tars, drink, fight, and sing;
True to yourselves, your country, and your
king!

§ 49. Prologue to Comus. Performed for the Benefit of the General Hospital at Bath, 1756; and spoken by Miss MORRISON, in the Character of a Lady of Fashion. HOADLEY.

[She enters with a number of tickets in her hand.]

WELL, I've been beating up for volunteers,
But find that charity has got no ears.

I first attack'd a colonel of the guards—

Sir, charity—consider its rewards;

With healing hand the saddest sores it skins,

And covers—O! a multitude of sins.

He swore the world was welcome to his thoughts:

'Twas damn'd hypocrisy to hide one's faults;

And with that sin his conscience ne'er was twitted,

The only one he never had committed.

Next to my knight I plead. He shook his
head,

Complain'd the stocks were low, and trade was dead.

In these Bath charities a tax he'd found

More heavy than four shillings in the pound.

What with the play-house, hospital, and abbey,

A man was stripp'd—unless he'd look quite shabby.

Then such a train, and such expense; to wit,
My lady, all the brats, and cousin Kit—

He'd steal himself, perhaps, into the pit.

Old Lady Slipslop, at her morning cards,

Vows that all works of genus she regards,

Raffles for Chinese gods, card houses, shells,

Nor grudges to the music, or the bells,

But has a strange antiquity to nasty ospitals.

I hope your lordship—then my lord replies—

No doubt, the governors are—very wise;

But, for the play, he wonder'd at their choice.

In Milton's days such stuff might be the taste,

But, faith! he thought it was damn'd dull and chaste:

Then swears he to the charity is hearty,

But can't in honor break his evening party.

When to the gouty alderman I sued,
The nasty fellow (gad) was downright rude,
Is begging grown the fashion, with a pox?
The mayor should set such housewives in the stocks.

Give you a guinea! Z——ds! replied the beast,
"I would buy a ticket for a turtle feast.

Think what a guinea a-head might set before
ye—

Surmullet—turbot—and a grand John Dory.

I'll never give a groat, as I'm a sinner,

Unless they gather 't in a dish—at dinner.

I trust, by art and more polite address,

Your fairer advocates met more success;

And not a man compassion's cause withstood,

When beauty pleaded for such gen'ral good.

§ 50. Prologue to the Winter's Tale, and Catherine and Petruchio. 1756. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK.

To various things the stage has been compar'd,
As apt ideas strike each humorous bard:

This night, for want of better simile,

Let this our theatre a tavern be:

The poets vintners, and the waiters we.

So, as the cant and custom of the trade is,

You're welcome, gemmen; kindly welcome, ladies.

To draw in customers, our bills are spread;

You cannot miss the sign, 'tis Shakspeare's
Head.

From this same head, this fountain-head divine,

For different palates springs a different wine;

In which no tricks, to strengthen or to thin 'em—

Neat as imported—no French brandy in 'em.

Hence for the choicest spirits flows Champagne, Whose sparkling atoms shoot through every
vein,

Then mount in magic vapors to th' enraptur'd
brain!

Hence flow for martial minds potations strong,

And sweet love-potions for the fair and young.

For you, my hearts of oak, for your regale,

[To the upper gallery.]

There's good old English stingo, mild and stale:

For high, luxurious souls, with luscious smack,

There's Sir John Falstaff in a butt of sack;

And, if the stronger liquors more invite ye,

Bardolph is gin, and Pistol aqua-vitæ.

But should you call for Falstaff, where to find
him,

He's gone—nor left one cup of sack behind him.

Sunk in his elbow-chair, no more he'll roam,

No more, with merry wags, to Eastcheap come;

He's gone—to jest and laugh, and give his sack,
at home.

As for the learned critics, grave and deep,

Who catch at words, and, catching, fall asleep;

Who, in the storms of passion, hum and haw—

For such our master will no liquor draw—

So blindly thoughtful, and so darkly read,

They take Tom Durfey's for the Shakspeare's
Head.

A vintner once acquir'd both praise and gain,

And sold much perry for the best Champagne.

Some rakes this precious stuff did so allure,
They drank whole nights—what's that when wine is pure?

“Come, fill a bumper, Jack.”—“I will, my Lord.”

“Here's cream!—damn'd fine!—immense!— upon my word!

“Sir William, what say you?”—“The best, believe me.”

“In this—eh, Jack!—the devil can't deceive
me.”

Thus the wise critic, too, mistakes his wine;
Cries out, with lifted hands—'Tis great! divine!
Then jogs his neighbour, as the wonders strike
him;

This Shakspeare! Shakspeare!—O, there's nothing like him!

In this night's various and enchanted cup
Some little perry's mix'd, for filling up.

The five long acts, from which our three are taken,

Stretch'd out to sixteen years*, lay by, forsaken:

Lest then this precious liquor run to waste,

'Tis now confin'd and bottled for your taste.

'Tis my chief wish, my joy, my only plan,
To lose no drop of that immortal man!

§ 51. Prologue to the Apprentice. 1756.
Spoken by Mr. MURPHY, Author of the Piece, dressed in black. GARRICK.

BEHOLD a wonder for theatric story!

The culprit of this night appears before ye:

Before his judges dares these boards to tread,

“With all his imperfections on his head!”

Prologues precede the piece, in mournful verse,

As undertakers walk before the hearse;

Whose doleful march may strike the harden'd
mind,

And wake its feelings for the dead behind.

Trick'd out in black, thus actors try their art,

To melt that rock of rocks, the critic's heart.

No acted fears my vanity betray!

I am, indeed—what others only play.

Thus far myself. The farce comes next in view;

Though many are its faults, at least 'tis new.

No smuggled, pilfer'd scenes from France we
show;

'Tis English—English, Sirs, from top to toe.

Though coarse my colors, and my hand un-
From real life my little cloth is fill'd. [skill'd,

My hero is a youth, by fate design'd

For culling simples—but whose stage-struck
mind

Nor fate could rule, nor his indentures bind.

A place there is, where such young Quixotes
meet;

'Tis call'd the spouting-club—a glorious treat!

Where prenticed kings alarm the gaping street.

There Brutus starts and stares by midnight taper,

Who all the day enacts—a woollen-draper. [fist:

Here Hamlet's ghost stalks forth with doubled

Cries out, with hollow voice, “List, list, O list!” [bacconist.

And frightens Denmark's prince—a young to-

The spirit too, clear'd from his deadly white,
Rises—a haberdasher to the sight!

Nor young attorneys have this rage withstood,
But change their pens for truncheons, ink for
blood;

And (strange reverse!)—die for their country's good.

Through all the town this folly you may trace;
Myself am witness—'tis a common case.

I've further proofs, could ye but think I wrong
ye—

Look round—you'll find some spouting youths among ye.

To check these heroes, and their laurels crop,
To bring them back to reason—and their shop;

To raise a harmless laugh, was all my aim;

And, if I shun contempt—I seek not fame.

Indulge this firstling, let me but begin,

Nor nip me—in the buddings of my sin:

Somes hopes I cherish, in your smiles I read 'em;

Whate'er my faults, your candor can exceed 'em.

§ 52. Epilogue to the same. 1756. Spoken
by Mrs. CLIVE. SMART.

[Enters, reading the play-bill.

A VERY pretty bill—as I'm alive!

The part of—Nobody—by Mrs. Clive!

A paltry, scribbling fool—to leave me out!

He'll say, perhaps—he thought I could not

Malice and envy to the last degree! [spout.

And why?—I wrote a farce as well as he,

And fairly ventur'd it, without the aid

Of prologue dress'd in black, and face in masquerade;

O pit, have pity—see how I'm dismay'd!

Poor soul! this canting stuff will never do,

Unless, like Bayes, he brings his hangman too.

But granting that, from these same obsequies,

Some pickings to our bard in black arise;

Should your applause to joy convert his fear,

As Pallas turns to feast Lardella's bier;

Yet 'twould have been a better scheme, by half,

T' have thrown his weeds aside, and learnt with me to laugh.

I could have shown him, had he been inclin'd,

A spouting junto of the female kind.

There dwells a milliner in yonder row,

Well-dress'd, full-voic'd, and nobly built for
show,

Who, when in rage she scolds at Sue and Sarah,

Damn'd, damn'd dissembler! thinks she's more than Zara.

She has a daughter too that deals in lace,

And sings—O ponder well—and Chevy-chase,

And fain would fill the fair Ophelia's place;

And in her cock'd-up hat, and gown of camlet,

Presumes on something—touching the lord
Hamlet.

A cousin too she has, with squinting eyes,

With waddling gait, and voice like London
cries,

Who, for the stage too short by half a story,

Acts Lady Townly—thus—in all her glory;

* The action of the Winter's Tale, as written by Shakspeare, comprehends sixteen years.

And, while she's traversing her scanty room,
Cries—"Lord, my lord, what can I do at home?"

In short, there's girls enough for all the fellows,
The ranting, whining, starting, and the jealous,
The Hotspurs, Romeos, Hamlets, and Othellos.
O! little do these silly people know
What dreadful trials actors undergo.
Myself, who most in harmony delight,
Am scolding here from morning until night.
Then take advice by me, ye giddy things,
Ye royal milliners, ye apron'd kings!
Young men, beware, and shun our slippery
Study arithmetic, and burn your plays; [ways,
And you, ye girls, let not our tinsel train
Enchant your eyes, and turn your madd'ning
brain:

Be timely wise; for, O! be sure of this:—
A shop, with virtue, is the height of bliss.

§ 53. Epilogue to the Reprisal. 1757. Spoken by Miss MACKLIN.

AYE—now I can with pleasure look around,
Safe as I am, thank Heaven, on English ground.
In a dark dungeon to be stow'd away,
'Midst roaring, thund'ring, danger, and dismay;
Expos'd to fire and water, sword and bullet—
Might damp the heart of any virgin pullet.
I dread to think what might have come to pass,
Had not the British lion quell'd the Gallic ass.
By Champignon a wretched victim led
To cloister'd cell, or more detested bed,
My days in pray'r and fasting I had spent;
As nun, or wife, alike a penitent.
His gallantry, so confident and eager,
Had prov'd a mess of delicate soup-meagre.
To bootless longings I had fell a martyr;
But Heaven be prais'd, the Frenchman caught a Tartar.

Yet soft—our author's fate you must decree;
Shall he come safe to port, or sink at sea?
Your sentence, sweet or bitter, soft or sore,
Floats his frail bark, or runs it bump ashore—
Ye wits above, restrain your awful thunder;
In his first cruize 'twere pity he should founder.

[To the gallery.

Safe from your shot, he fears no other foe,
No gulf but that which horrid yawns below.

[To the Pit.

The bravest chiefs, e'en Hannibal and Cato,
Have here been tam'd with—pippin and potatoe.
Our bard embarks in a more Christian cause,
He claims not mercy, but he claims applause,
His pen against the hostile French is drawn,
Who damns him is no Antigallican.
Indulg'd with fav'ring gales and smiling skies,
Hereafter he may board a richer prize.
But if this welkin angry clouds deform,

[Looking round the house.

And hollow groans portend th' approaching
storm;

[To the gallery.

Should the descending show'rs of hail redouble,
And these rough billows hiss, and boil, and bubble,

[To the pit.

He'll launch no more on such fell seas of trouble.

§ 54. Prologue to the Author. 1757. FOOTE.

SEVERE their task, who, in this critic age,
With fresh materials furnish out the stage!
Not that our fathers drain'd the comic store;
Fresh characters spring up as heretofore.
Nature with novelty does still abound;
On ev'ry side fresh follies may be found.
But then the taste of every guest to hit,
To please at once the gallery, box, and pit,
Requires, at least, no common share of wit.
Those who adorn the orb of higher life,
Demand the lively rake or modish wife;
Whilst they who in a lower circle move,
Yawn at their wit, and slumber at their love.
If light low mirth employs the comic scene,
Such mirth as drives from vulgar minds the
spleen,
The polish'd critic damns the wretched stuff,
And cries—" 'Twill please the gall'ries well
enough."

Such jarring judgements who can reconcile?
Since fops will frown, where humble traders
smile.

To dash the poet's ineffectual claim,
And quench his thirst for universal fame,
The Grecian fabulist in moral lay
Has thus address'd the writers of his day:
Once on a time, a son and sire, we're told,
The stripling tender, and the father old,
Purchas'd a jack-ass at a country fair,
To ease their limbs, and hawk about their ware;
But as the sluggish animal was weak,
They fear'd, if both should mount, his back would break:

Up gets the boy, the father leads the ass,
And through the gazing crowd attempts to pass;
Forth from the throng the greybeards hobble out,
And hail the cavalcade with feeble shout.

"This the respect to rev'rend age you show,
And this the duty you to parents owe?

He beats the hoof, and you are set astride:
Sirrah! get down, and let your father ride."

As Grecian lads are seldom void of grace,
The decent duteous youth resign'd his place.

Then a fresh murmur through the rabble ran,
Boys, girls, wives, widows all attack the man.

"Sure never was brute beast so void of nature!
Have you no pity for the pretty creature?

To your own baby can you be unkind?

Here—Suke, Bill, Betty—put the child behind."

[claim'd:

Old Dapple next the clown's compassion
" 'Tis wonderment them boobies ben'tasham'd!

Two at a time upon the poor dumb beast!
They might as well have carried him, at least."

The pair, still pliant to the partial voice,
Dismount, and bear the ass—Then what a noise!

Huzzas, loud laughs, low gibe, and bitter joke,
From the yet silent sire, these words provoke:

"Proceed, my boy, nor heed their farther call;
Vain his attempts, who strives to please them all."

§ 55. Prologue to the Trip to Paris. Spoken by Mr. SHUTER, at one of his Benefits.

FOOTE.

IN former times there liv'd one Aristotle,
Who, as the song says, lov'd, like me, his bottle.

To Alexander Magnus he was tutor—
 (A'n't you surpris'd to hear the learned Shuter?)
 But let that rest—a new tale I'll advance,
 A tale?—no; truth, mun—I'm just come from France. [ter;
 From Paris I came; why I went there, no mat-I'm glad that once more I'm on this side the water.

'Twas to win a large wager that hurried me over;
 But I wish'd to be off when I came down to Dover;

To swallow sea-water the doctors will tell ye,
 But the sight of such water at once fill'd my belly; [sea,

They who choose it for physic may drink of the
 But only to think on't is physic for me.

When I first went on board, Lord! I heard such a racket,

Such babbling and squabbling, fore and aft,
     through the packet;

The passengers bawling, the sailors yoho-ing,
 The ship along dashing, the winds aloft blowing;
 Some sick, and some swearing, some singing,
     some shrieking,

Sails hoisting, blocks rattling, the yards and brooms creaking; [our cases,

Stop the ship!—but the tars, never minding Took their chaws, hitch'd their trowsers, and grinn'd in our faces.

We made Calais soon, and were soon set on shore,
 And I trod on French ground, where I ne'er
     trod before. [Yo, yo-ho.

The scene was quite chang'd; 'twas no more,
 With Damme Jack, yes, boy—or Damme
     Tom, no! [plaisance;

'Twas quite t'other thing, mun, 'twas all com-
 With cringes and scrapes we were welcom'd to France:

Ah, Monseer Angloy—they cried—be on ven nu,
Tres umble servant, Sir, we glad to see you.

I ne'er met such figures before in my rambles,
 They flock'd round my carcase like flies in the shambles:

To be crowded amongst them at first I was loth,
 For fear they should seize me, and souse me for broth.

At last though, they call'd me my Lor Angleterre, (Lord, had you then seen but my strut and my stare!)

Wee, wee, I cried, wee then—and put on a sword;
 So at once Neddy Shuter turn'd into a lord.

I expected at France all the world and his wife,
 But I never was balk'd so before in my life:

I should see wonders there, I was told by
     Monseer; [queer;

So I did, I saw things that were wonderful Queer streets and queer houses, with people much queerer;

Each one was a talker, but no one a hearer.

I soon had enough of their pallouousee;
 Its a fine phrase to some folks, but nonsense
     to me. [show,

All folks there are dress'd in a toyshop-like
 A hodge-podging habit 'twixt fiddler and beau;
 Such hats, and such heads too, such coats and such skirts— [shirts.

They sold me some ruffles—but I found the

Then, as to their dinners, their soups, and their stewings,

One ounce of meat serves for ten gallons of brewings; [agog!

For a slice of roast beef how my mind was
 But for beef they produced me a fricaseed frog:
 Out of window I toss'd it, it wa'n't fit to eat,
 Then down stairs I jump'd, and ran into the street. [mine

'Twas not their palaver could make me deter-
 To stay where I found it was taste to eat vermin:
 Frogs in France may be fine, and their Grand Monarque clever; [for ever!
 I'm for beef, and King George, and old England

§ 56. Epilogue to the Minor. 1760.

NEAR the mad mansions of Moorfields I'll bawl;

Friends, fathers, mothers, sisters, sons, and all,
 Shut up your shops, and listen to my call.

With labor, toil, all second means, dispense,
 And live a rent-charge upon Providence.

Prick up your ears; a story now I'll tell,
 Which once a widow and her child befell;

I knew the mother and her daughter well:
 Poor, it is true, they were, but never wanted,

For whatsoe'er they ask'd was always granted.
 One fatal day the matron's truth was tried,

She wanted meat and drink, and faintly cried.
Child. Mother, you cry!—

Mother. O child! I've got no bread.

Child. What matters that? Why, Providence an't dead! [say;

With reason good the child this truth might
 For there came in at noon, that very day,

Bread, greens, potatoes, and a leg of mutton,
 A better sure a table ne'er was put on.

Ay, that might be, ye cry, with those poor souls:
 But we ne'er had a rasher for the coals.

And d'ye deserve it? How d'ye spend your
 In pastimes, prodigality, and plays! [days?

Let's go see Foote; O, Foote's a precious limb!
 Old Nick will soon a foot-ball make of him!

For foremost rows in side-boxes you shove:
 Think you to meet with side-boxes above,

Where giggling girls and powder'd fops may sit?
 No, you will all be cram'd into the pit,

And crowd the house for Satan's benefit.—
 O! what, you snivel?—Well, do so no more—

Drop, to atone, your money at the door,
 And—if I please—I'll give it to the poor.

§ 57. Prologue to Polly Honeycombe. 1760. GARRICK.

HITHER, in days of yore, from Spain or France,
 Came a dread sorceress, her name Romance:

O'er Britain's isle her wayward spells she cast,
 And Common Sense in magic chain bound fast.

In mad sublime did each fond lover woo,
 And in heroics ran each billet-doux:

High deeds of chivalry their sole delight,
 Each fair a maid distress'd, each swain a knight.

Then might Statira Oroondates see
At tilts and tournaments, arm'd cap-a-pie.
She too, on milk-white palfrey, lance in hand,
A dwarf to guard her, pranc'd about the land.

This fiend to quell, his sword Cervantes drew,
A trusty Spanish blade, Toledo true:
Her talismans and magic wand he broke;
Knights, genii, castles, vanish'd into smoke.

But now, the dear delight of later years,
The younger sister of Romance appears:
Less solemn is her air, her drift the same,
And Novel her enchanting, charming name.
Romance might strike our grave forefathers'
pomp,

But Novel for our buck and lively romp!
Cassandra's folios now no longer read,
See two neat pocket-volumes in their stead!
And then, so sentimental is the style,
So chaste, yet so bewitching all the while!
Plot and elopement, passion, rape, and rapture,
The total sum of ev'ry dear—dear—chapter.

'Tis not alone the small-talk and the smart,
'Tis Novel most beguiles the female heart.
Miss reads—she melts—she sighs—love steals upon her—

And then—alas, poor girl!—good night, poor
Honor!

'Thus of our Polly having lightly spoke,
Now for our author—but without a joke.
Though wits and journals, who ne'er fibb'd
before,

Have laid this bantling at a certain door,
Where, lying store of faults, they'd fain heap
more,

I now declare it, as a serious truth,
'Tis the first folly of a simple youth,
Caught and deluded by our harlot plays—
Then crush not in the shell this infant Bayes!
Exert your favor to a young beginner;
Nor use the stripling like a batter'd sinner*.'

§ 58. Prologue to All in the Wrong. 1761.
Written and spoken by Mr. FOOTE.

TO-NIGHT, be it known to box, gall'ries,
and pit,
Will be open the original warehouse of wit;
The new manufacture, Foote and Co. undertakers,

Play, opera, pantomime, farce—by the makers.
We scorn, like our brethren, our fortunes to owe

To Shakspeare and Southerne, to Otway and Though our judgement may err, yet our justice is shown,

For we promise to mangle no works but our
And moreover, on this you may firmly rely,
If we can't make you laugh, that we won't make you cry;

For our monarch, who knew we were mirth-
loving souls,

Has lock'd up his lightning, his daggers, and bowls;

Resolv'd that in buskins no hero should stalk,
He has shut us quite out of the tragedy-walk.
No blood, no blank verse—in short we're un-
done,

Unless you're contented with frolic and fun.
If, tir'd of her round in the Ranelagh mill,
There should be one female inclin'd to sit still;
If, blind to the beauties, or sick of the squall,
A party shouldn't choose to catch cold at Vaux-
hall;

If at Sadler's sweet Wells the wine should be
The cheesecakes be sour, or Miss Wilkinson
sick,

If the fume of the pipe should prove pow'ful
Or the tumblers be lame, or the bells out of tune;
We hope you will call at our warehouse in Drury:

We've a curious assortment of goods, I assure
Domestic and foreign, indeed all kind of wares, English cloth, Irish linens, and French pet-en-l'airs.

If, for want of good custom, or losses in trade,
The poetical partners should bankrupts be
made;

If, from dealings too large, we plunge deeply
And a Whereas comes out in the Muses' Gazette,
We'll on you, our assigns, for certificates call;
Though insolvents, we're honest, and give up our all.

§ 59. Epilogue to the Liar, 1761; between Miss Grantham and Old Wilding.

M. Gr. HOLD, Sir!

Our plot concluded, and strict justice done,
Let me be heard, as counsel for your son.
Acquit I can't, I mean to mitigate;
Proscribe all lying, what would be the fate
Of this and every other earthly state?
Consider, Sir, if once you cry it down,
You'll shut up every coffee-house in town;
The tribe of politicians will want food,
Even now half-famish'd—for the public good;
All Grub-street murderers of men and sense,
And every office of intelligence,
All would be bankrupts, the whole lying race,
And no Gazette to publish their disgrace.

O. Wild. Too mild a sentence! Must the good and great

Patriots be wrong'd, that booksellers may eat?
M. Gr. Your patience, Sir; yet hear another
word:

Turn to that hall where Justice wields her
Think in what narrow limits you would draw,
By this proscription, all the sons of law:
For 'tis the fix'd determin'd rule of courts,
(Viner will tell you—nay, even Coke's Reports)
All pleaders may, when difficulties rise,
To gain one truth expend a hundred lies.

O. Wild. To curb this practice I am somewhat loth;

A lawyer has no credit but on oath.

M. Gr. Then to the softer sex some favor
Leave us possession of our modest No!

* These lines were added by Mr. Garrick, on its being reported that he was the author of the piece; and, however humorous and poetical, contain as strict matter of fact as the dullest prose.

O. Wild. O freely, Ma'am, we'll that allowance give,
So that two noes be held affirmative:
Provided ever, that your pish and fie,
On all occasions, should be deem'd a lie.

M. Gr. Hard terms!

On this rejoinder then I rest my cause:
Should all pay homage to truth's sacred laws,
Let us examine what would be the case;
Why, many a great man would be out of place.

O. Wild. 'Twould many a virtuous character restore.

M. Gr. But take a character from many more.

O. Wild. Strong are your reasons; yet, ere I submit,

I mean to take the voices of the pit.
Is it your pleasures that we make a rule,
That ev'ry liar be proclaim'd a fool,
Fit subjects for our author's ridicule?

§ 60. Prologue to the Earl of Essex. 1761.

MURPHY.

WHENE'ER the brave, the gen'rous, and
the just,
Whene'er the patriot sinks to silent dust,
The tragic muse attends the mournful hearse,
And pays her tribute of immortal verse.

Inspir'd by noble deeds, she seeks the plain,
In honor's cause where mighty chiefs are slain;
And bathes with tears the sod that wraps the
And bids the turf lie lightly on his head. [dead,

Nor thus content, she opens death's cold
womb,

And bursts the cerements of the awful tomb,
To cast him up again—to bid him live,
And to the scene his form and presence give.

Thus once-fam'd Essex at her voice appears,
Emerging from the sacred dust of years.

Nor deem it much, that we retrace, to-night,
A tale to which you've listen'd with delight.
How oft, of yore, to learned Athens' eyes
Did new Electras and new Phædras rise!

In France, how many Theban monarchs groan
For Laius' blood, and incest not their own!
When there new Iphigenias raise the sigh,
Fresh drops of pity gush from ev'ry eye.

On the same theme though rival wits appear,
The heart still finds the sympathetic tear.

If there soft Pity pour her plenteous store,
For fabled kings, and empires now no more;
Much more should you, from freedom's glorious plan,

Who still inherit all the rights of man;
Much more should you with kindred sorrows glow

For your own chiefs, your own domestic woe;
Much more a British story should impart
The warmest feelings to each British heart.

§ 61. Prologue to the School for Lovers. 1762.

Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK.

SUCCESS makes people vain—the maxim's
We all confess it, and not over-new. [true,

The veriest clown, who stumps along the streets,
And doffs his hat to each grave cit he meets,
Some twelve months hence, bedawb'd with livery lace,

Shall thrust his saucy flambeau in your face.
Not so our bard—though twice your kind applause

Has, on this fickle spot, espous'd his cause;
He owns with gratitude th' obliging debt;
Has twice been favor'd, and is modest yet.

Your giant wits, like those of old, may climb
Olympus-high, and step o'er space and time;
May stride, with seven-league boots, from shore to shore,

And, nobly by transgressing, charm ye more.

Alas! our author dares not laugh at schools—
Plain sense confines his humbler muse to rules:

He shifts no scene—But here I stopt him short—“Not change your scenes?” said I—“I'm sorry for't:

My constant friends above, around, below,
Have English tastes, and love both change and
show:

Without such aid even Shakspeare would be flat,
Our crowded pantomimes are proofs of that.

What eager transport starts from ev'ry eye,
When pulleys rattle, and our genii fly!

When tin cascades, like falling waters, gleam,
Or through the canvas bursts the real stream;

While thirsty Islington laments, in vain,

Half her New-river roll'd to Drury-lane!

Lord, sir!” said I, “for gallery, boxes, pit,

I'll back my Harlequin against your wit.”

Yet still the author, anxious for his play,
Shook his wise head—“What will the critics
say?”

“As usual, sir—abuse you all they can!”

“And what the ladies?”—“He's a charming man!

A charming piece!—one scarce knows what it means;

But that's no matter—when there's such sweet scenes!”

Still he persists—and let him—entre nous—

I know your tastes, and will indulge 'em too.

Change you shall have: so set your hearts at ease:

Write as he will, we'll act it—as you please.

§ 62. Prologue upon Prologues, to the Deuce is in Him. Spoken by Mr. King. GARRICK.

And egad it will do for any other Play as well as this. BAYES.

AN old trite proverb let me quote—

As is your cloth, so cut your coat.

To suit our author, and his farce,

Short let me be, for wit is scarce;

Nor would I show it, had I any:

The reasons why are strong and many.

Should I have wit, the piece has none;

A flash in pan with empty gun,

The piece is sure to be undone.

A tavern with a gaudy sign,

Whose bush is better than the wine,

May cheat you once—Will that device,

Neat as imported, cheat you twice?

'Tis wrong to raise your expectations :
Poets, be dull in dedications !
Dulness in these to wit prefer—
But there indeed, you seldom err.
In prologues, prefaces, be flat !
A silver button spoils your hat.
A threadbare coat might jokes escape,
Did not the blockheads lace the cape.
A case in point to this before ye ;
Allow me, pray, to tell a story.

To turn the penny, once a wit
Upon a curious fancy hit,
Hung out a board, on which he boasted,
Dinner for three-pence, boil'd and roasted.
The hungry read, and in they trip,
With eager eye, and smacking lip—
“ Here, bring this boil'd and roasted, pray—”
Enter potatoes, dress'd each way.
All star'd and rose, the house forsook,
And damn'd the dinner—kick'd the cook.
My landlord found, poor Patrick Kelly !
There was no joking with the belly.

These facts laid down, then thus I reason,
Wit in a prologue's out of season.
Yet still will you for jokes sit watching,
Like Cock-lane folks for Fanny's scratching.
And here my simile's so fit,
For prologues are but ghosts of wit ;
Which mean to show their art and skill,
And scratch you to their author's will.
In short, for reasons great and small,
'Tis better to have none at all.
Prologues and ghosts !—a paltry trade—
So let 'em both at once be laid !
Say but the word—give your commands,
We'll tie our prologue-monger's hands :
Confine these culprits, bind 'em tight,
[Holding up his hands.
Nor girl can scratch, nor fools can write.

§ 63. Epilogue to Elvira. 1763. GARRICK.

LADIES and gentlemen—'tis so ill-bred—
We have no epilogue, because I'm dead ;
For he, our bard, with phrensy-rolling eye,
Swears you shan't laugh, when he has made
you cry :
At which I gave his sleeve a gentle pull,
Suppose they should not cry, and should be dull ;
In such a case, 'twould surely do no harm ;
A little lively nonsense taken warm,
On critic stomachs delicate and queasy,
'Twill even make a heavy meal sit easy.
The town hates epilogues—It is not true,
I answer'd that for you—and you—and you—
[To Pit, Boxes, and First Gallery.
They call for epilogues and hornpipes too.
[To the upper Gallery.
Madam, the critics say—to you they're civil,
Here, if they have 'em not, they'll play the devil—
Out of this house, sir : and to you alone, They'll smile, cry Bravo ! Charming !—Here
they groan ;
A single critic will not frown, look big,
Harmless and pliant as a single twig :

But crowded here they change, and 'tis not odd,
For twigs, when bundled up, become a rod.
Critics to bards, like beauties to each other,
When tête-à-tête their enmity they smother :
“ Kiss me, my dear—how do you ?—charming creature !

What shape ! what bloom ! what spirit in each feature !”

“ You flatter me.”—“ 'Pon honor, no.”—
“ You do—

My friend—my dear—sincerely yours—adieu !”
But when at routs, the dear friends change their
tone :

I speak of foreign ladies, not our own.
Will you permit, good sirs, these gloomy folk
To give all tragedy without one joke ?
They gravely tell us, Tragedy's design'd
To purge the passions, purify the mind :
To which I say, to strike those blockheads dumb,
With physic always give a sugar-plum.
I love these sugar-plums in prose or rhymes :
No one is merrier than myself sometimes ;
Yet I, poor I, with tears and constant moan,
Am melted down almost to skin and bone :
This night, in sighs and sobs I drew my breath ;
Love, marriage, treason, prison, poison, death,
Were scarce sufficient to complete my fate ;
Two children were thrown in to make up
weight.

With all these suff'rings, is it not provoking,
To be denied at last a little joking ? [break 'em :
If they will make new laws, for mirth's sake
Roar out for epilogues, and let me speak 'em.

§ 64. Mr. Foote's Address to the Public, after a Prosecution against him for a Libel. 1764.
FOOTE.

HUSH ! let me search before I speak aloud—
Is no informer skulking in the crowd,
With art laconic noting all that's said,
Malice at heart, indictments in his head ;
Prepar'd to level all the legal war,
And rouse the clamorous legions of the bar ?
Is there none such ?—Not one :—then, entre
nous,

I will a tale unfold, though strange, yet true ;
The application must be made by you.

At Athens once, fair queen of arms and arts,
There dwelt a citizen of moderate parts * ;
Precise his manner, and demure his looks,
His mind unletter'd, though he dealt in books ;
Amorous, though old ; though dull, lov'd repartee ;

And pen'd a paragraph most daintily :
He aim'd at purity in all he said,
And never once omitted eth or ed ;
In hath, and doth, was rarely known to fail,
Himself the hero of each little tale ;
With wits and lords this man was much delighted, [knighted.

And once (it has been said) was near being
One Aristophanes (a wicked wit,
Who never heeded grace in what he writ)

* George Faulkner, bookseller.

Had mark'd the manners of this Grecian sage,
And, thinking him a subject for the stage,
Had from the lumber cull'd, with curious care,
His voice, his looks, his gesture, gait, and air,
His affectation, consequence, and mien,
And boldly launch'd him on the comic scene.
Loud peals of plaudits through the circle ran,
All felt the satire, for all knew the man.

Then Peter—Petros was his classic name,
Fearing the loss of dignity and fame,
To a grave lawyer in a hurry flies,
Opens his purse, and begs his best advice.
The fee secur'd, the lawyer strokes his band,
"The case you put I fully understand;
The thing is plain from Cocos's reports,
For rules of poetry a' n't rules of courts:
A libel this—I'll make the mummer know
A Grecian constable took up the poet, [it."—
Restrain'd the sallies of his laughing muse,
Call'd harmless humour scandalous abuse:
The bard appeal'd from this severe decree,
Th' indulgent public set the pris'ner free:
Greece was to him what Dublin is to me.

§ 65. Prologue spoken by Mr. Love on the opening of the new Theatre on Richmond Green, 1765. GARRICK.

THE ship now launch'd with necessities
stor'd, [on board,
Rigg'd, mann'd, well-built, and a rich freight
All ready, tight and trim, from head to poop,
And, by commission, made a royal sloop;
May Heaven from tempests, rocks and priva-teers,
Preserve the Richmond!—Give her, boys,
three cheers! [Three huzzas behind.
Queen Mab, our Shakspeare says, and I believe him, [him:
In sleep haunts each vain mortal, to deceive
As in her hazel-nut she lightly trips,
By turns, o'er eyes, ears, fingers, nose, and lips,
Each quicken'd sense such sweet enchantment
seizes,
We hear, see, smell, taste, touch—whate'er
she pleases. [see,
Look round this house, and various proofs you'll Strong glaring proofs, that Mab has been with me.
She caught me napping, knew where I was
And tickled ev'ry fibre of my brain: [vain,
Deep in my musing (deep as I was able)
Methought I saw her driving tow'rd's my table;
She whisk'd her chariot o'er my books and shelves,
And at my standish stopp'd her tiny elves.
"What are you scribbling there?—Quick, let me see—
Poh! leave this nonsense, and along with me!"
I, grinning, bow'd—"Bright star of Lilliput!
Shall I not crowd you in your hazel-nut?"
She smil'd; and showing me a large-siz'd hamper, [scamper."
"Get into this, my friend, and then we'll
I for this frolic wanting quick digestion,
Sent to my tongue, post-haste, another question.

But, crack! she went, before that I could ask it;
She in her stage—I, Falstaff, in the basket:
She wav'd her wand, then burst in fits of laughter,
To see me rolling, bounding, tumbling after:
And I laugh'd too—Could you of laughing fail,
To see a minnow towing of a whale?
At last we rested on a hill hard by,
With a sweet vale to feast the glutton eye—
"I'll show you more," she said, "to charm and move us;" [drove us:
And to the gardens, quick as thought, she Then pointing to the shade—"There, there they are,
Of this most happy isle the happiest pair!"
O, may those virtuous raptures never cease,
Nor public cares disturb their private peace;
She sigh'd—and like the lightning was she seen
To drive her chariot o'er this fav'rite green;
Straight to this spot—where she infus'd such things
Might turn the heads of twenty playhouse kings.
But fear dispersing all my golden dream,
And I just entering on this fairy-scheme;
With wild surprise, I cast my eyes about,
Delusion ends—and now I wake to doubt:
O, may the dream be realis'd by you!
Your smiles or frowns can make this false or
true.

§ 66. Prologue to Much ado about Nothing, acted by Command of their Majesties, 1765. Written and spoken by Mr. GARRICK, being his first Appearance after his Return from Italy.

WITH doubt, joy, apprehension, almost dumb,
To face this awful court, once more I come:
Lest Benedick should suffer by my fear,
Before he enters, I myself am here.
I'm told (what flattery to my heart!) that you
Have wish'd to see me; nay, have press'd it
Alas! 'twill prove another Much ado. [too:
I, like a boy who long has truant play'd,
No lessons got, no exercises made,
On bloody Monday takes his fearful stand,
And often eyes the birchen-scepter'd hand.
'Tis twice twelve years since first the stage I
trod,
Enjoy'd your smiles, and felt the critic's rod:
A very nine-pin I, my stage life through;
Knock'd down by wits, set up again by you.
In four-and-twenty years the spirits cool;
Is it not long enough to play the fool?
To prove it is, permit me to repeat
What late I heard in passing thro' the street:
A youth of parts, with ladies by his side,
Thus cock'd his glass, and through it shot my
pride:
"Tis he, by Jove! grown quite a clumsy
fellow,
He's fit for nothing—but a Punchinello!"
O yes, for comic scenes, Sir John—no further:
He's much too fat—for battles, rapes, and murder!"

Worn in the service, you my faults will spare,
And make allowance for the wear and tear.

The Chelsea pensioner, who, rich in scars,
Fights o'er, in prattle, all his former wars;
Tho' past the service, may the young ones teach
To march—present—to fire—and mount the breach.

Should the drum beat to arms, at first he'll
For wooden leg, lost eye, and armless sleeve;
Then cocks his hat, looks fierce, and swells his chest:

“ 'Tis for my king; and, zounds! I'll do my § 67. Prologue to the Clandestine Marriage.

1766. GARRICK.

POETS and Painters, who from nature draw
Their best and richest stores, have made this law,

That each should neighbourly assist his brother,
And steal with decency from one another.

To-night, your matchless Hogarth gives the
thought,

Which from the canvas to the stage is brought;
And who so fit to warm the poet's mind,
As he who pictur'd morals and mankind?
But not the same their characters and scenes;
Both labour for one end by diff'rent means;
Each, as it suits him, takes a sep'rate road,
Their one great object, marriage à-la-mode;
Where titles deign with cits to have and hold,
And change rich blood for more substantial
gold!

And honour'd trade from int'rest turns aside,
To hazard happiness for titled pride.

The painter dead, yet still he charms the eye;
While England lives, his fame can never die:
But he who struts his hour upon the stage,
Can scarce extend his fame for half an age;
Nor pen nor pencil can the actor save—

The art and artist share one common grave.

O let me drop one tributary tear, [bier*!
On poor Jack Falstaff's grave and Juliet's
You to their worth must testimony give;
'Tis in your hearts alone their fame can live;
Still as the scenes of life will shift away,
The strong impressions of their art decay.
Your children cannot feel what you have known;
They'll boast of Quins and Cibbers of their own.
The greatest glory of our happy few,
Is to be felt, and be approv'd by you.

§ 68. Prologue to the Tailors. 1767.
GARRICK.

THIS night we add some heroes to our store,
Who never were as heroes seen before;
No blust'ring Romans, Trojans, Greeks, shall rage; [stage,
No knights arm'd cap-à-pie, shall crowd our
Nor shall our Henries, Edwards, take the field,
Opposing sword to sword, and shield to shield:
With other instruments our troop appears;
Needles to thimbles shall, and shears to shears;

* Mr. Quin and Mrs. Cibber both died a little before.

With parchment gorgets and in buckram arm'd,
Cold-blooded tailors are to heroes warm'd,
And slip-shod slide to war—No lions' glare,
No eye-balls flashing fire shall make you stare;
Each outside shall belie the stuff within:

A Roman spirit in each tailor's skin—

A tailor-legg'd Pompey, Cassius, shall you see,
And the ninth part of Brutus strut in me;

What though no swords we draw, no daggers
Yet can our warriors a quietus make [shake?

With a bare bodkin.—Now be dumb, ye railers,
And never, but in honour, call out tailors!

But these are heroes tragic, you will cry;
O, very tragic! and I'll tell you why—

Should female artists with the male combine,
And mantua-makers with the tailors join;

Should all, too proud to work, their trades give
o'er,

Not to be sooth'd again by six-pence more;
What horrors would ensue!—First you, ye
beaux,

At once lose all existence with your clothes!
And you, ye fair, where would be your defence?

This is no golden age of innocence!
Such drunken Bacchanals the Graces meet,

And no police to guard the naked street:
Beauty is weak, and passion bold and strong—

O then—but modesty restrains my tongue.
May this night's bard a skilful tailor be,

And like a well-made coat his tragedy:
Though close, yet easy; decent, but not dull:

Short, but not scanty; without buckram, full.

§ 69. Epilogue to the English Merchant.
1767. GARRICK.

Enter Lady Alton [Mrs. Abington] in a passion; Spatter [Mr. King] following.

L. Alton. I'LL hear no more, thou wretch!
Spatter. Attend to reason!

L. Alton. A woman of my rank, 'tis petty treason!

Hear reason, blockhead! Reason! what is that?
Bid me wear pattens and a high-crown'd hat!

Won't you begone? What, won't you? What's your view? [you.—

Spatter. Humbly to serve the tuneful nine in
L. Alton. I renounce such things; [strings:

Not Phœbus now, but vengeance, sweeps the
My mind is discord all! I scorn, detest

All human kind—you more than all the rest.
Spatter. I humbly thank you, Ma'am—but weigh the matter. [you, Spatter!

L. Alton. I won't hear reason! and I hate Myself, and ev'ry thing.

Spatter. That I deny;
You love a little mischief, so do I;

And mischief I have for you.
L. Alton. How? where? when?

Will you stab Falbridge?
Spatter. Yes, Ma'am—with my pen.

L. Alton. Let loose, my Spatter, till to death
you've stung 'em,
That green-eyed monster, jealousy, among 'em.

Spatter. To dash at all, the spirit of my trade is,
Men, women, children, parsons, lords, and
There will be danger.

L. Alton. And there shall be pay—
Take my purse, Spatter! [Gives it him.]

Spatter. In an honest way.
[Smiles and takes it.]

L. Alton. Should my lord beat you—

Spatter. Let them laugh that win.
For all my bruises here's gold beater's skin;
[Chinking the purse.]

L. Alton. Nay, should he kill you!

Spatter. Ma'am?

L. Alton. My kindness meant
To pay your merit with a monument!

Spatter. Your kindness, lady, takes away
my breath: [death.]
We'll stop, with your good leave, on this side

L. Alton. Attack Amelia, both in verse and
Your wit can make a nettle of a rose. [prose,

Spatter. A stinging-nettle for his lordship's
breast:

And to my stars and dashes leave the rest.
I'll make them miserable, never fear;
Pout in a month, and part in half a year.
I know my genius, and can trust my plan;
I'll break a woman's heart with any man.

L. Alton. Thanks, thanks, dear Spatter! be severe and bold!

Spatter. No qualms of conscience with a purse of gold.
Tho' pill'ries threaten, and tho' crab-sticks fall, Yours are my heart, soul, pen, ears, bones, and all." [Exit Spatter.]

Lady Alton alone.

Thus to the winds at once my cares I scatter—
O, 'tis a charming rascal, this same Spatter!
His precious mischief makes the storm subside!
My anger, thank my stars! all rose from pride;
Pride should belong to us alone of fashion;
And let the mob take love, that vulgar passion.
Love, pity, tenderness, are only made
For Poets, Abigails, and folks in trade.
Some cits about their feelings make a fuss,
And some are better bred—who live with us.
How low lord Falbridge is!—He takes a wife,
To love, and cherish, and be fix'd for life!
Thinks marriage is a comfortable state,
No pleasure like a vartuous tête-à-tête!
Do our lords justice, for I would not wrong 'em,
There are not many such poor souls among 'em.
Our turtles from the town will fly with speed,
And I'll foretell the vulgar life they'll lead.
With love and ease grown fat, they face all weather, [ther:

And, farmers both, trudge arm in arm toge-
Now view their stock, now in their nursery
prattle,

For ever with their children or their cattle.
Like the dull mill-horse in one round they keep;
They walk, talk, fondle, dine, and fall asleep;
"Their custom always in the afternoon—"
He bright as Sol, and she the chaste full moon!
Wak'd with her coffee, Madam first begins,
She rubs her eyes, his lordship rubs his shins;

She sips and smirks—"Next week's our wedding-day,
Married seven years!—and every hour more gay?" [Yawns.]

"True, Emmy," cries my lord, "the blessing
lies,

"Our hearts in ev'ry thing so sympathise!"
[Yawns.]

The day thus spent, my lord for music calls;
He thrums the base, to which my lady squalls;
The children join, which so delight these nin-
nies,

The brats seem all Guaduccies, Lovatinis.

—What means this qualm?—Why, sure, while
I'm despising,

That vulgar passion, Envy, is not rising!
O no!—Contempt is struggling to burst out—
I'll give it vent at Lady Scalp'em's rout.

[Exit hastily.]

§ 70. Epilogue to Zenobia. 1768. Spoken by Mrs. Abington. GARRICK.

[She peeps through the curtain.]

How do you all, good folks?—In tears, for certain;

I'll only take a peep behind the curtain:
You're all so full of tragedy and sadness,
For me to come among you would be madness!
This is no time for giggling—when you've
leisure,

Call out for me, and I'll attend your pleasure;
As soldiers hurry at the beat of drum,
Beat but your hands, that instant I will come.

[She enters upon their clapping.]

This is so good! to call me out so soon—
The Comic Muse by me entreats a boon;
She call'd for Pritchard, her first maid of honor,

And begg'd of her to take the task upon her;
But she, I am sure you'll all be sorry for't,
Resigns her place, and soon retires from court:
To bear this loss we courtiers make a shift,
When good folks leave us, worse may have a lift.

The Comic Muse, whose ev'ry smile is grace,
And her stage sister, with her tragic face,
Have had a quarrel—each has writ a case;
And on their friends assembled now I wait,
To give you of their diff'rence a true state.
Melpomene complains, when she appears,
For five good acts, in all her pomp of tears,
To raise your souls, and with your raptures wing 'em, [wring 'em—

Nay, wet your handkerchiefs, that you may
Some flippant hussey, like myself, comes in;
Crack goes her fan, and with a giggling grin,
"Hey! Presto! pass!"—all topsy-turvy see,
For "ho, ho, ho!" is chang'd to "he, he, he!"
We own'd the fault, but 'tis a fault in vogue;
'Tis theirs who call and bawl for—Epilogue;
O, shame upon you!—for the time to come,
Know better, and go miserable home.

What says our comic goddess?—With re-
proaches,

She vows her sister tragedy encroaches!

And, spite of all her virtue and ambition,
Is known to have an amorous disposition!
For in False Delicacy—wondrous sly,
Join'd with a certain Irishman—O fie!
She made you, when you ought to laugh, to cry.
Her sister's smiles with tears she tried to smother,

Rais'd such a tragi-comic kind of pother,
You laugh'd with one eye, while you cried with t'other.

What can be done?—sad work behind the scenes!

There comic females scold with tragic queens;
Each party diff'rent ways the foe assails,
These shake the daggers, those prepare their nails.

'Tis you alone must calm these dire mishaps,
Or we shall still continue pulling caps.
What is your will?—I read it in your faces
That all hereafter take their proper places,
Shake hands, and kiss, be friends, and burn their cases.

§ 71. Epilogue spoken by Mrs. Pritchard, on her quitting the stage. 1768. GARRICK.

THE curtain dropt—my mimic life is past,
That scene of sleep and terror* was my last.
Could I in such a scene my exit make,
When every real feeling is awake?

Which beating here, superior to all art,
Bursts in full tides from a most grateful heart.

I now appear myself, distress'd, dismay'd,
More than in all the characters I've play'd;
In acted passion, tears may SEEM to flow,
“But I have that within that passeth show.”

Before I go, and this lov'd spot forsake,
What gratitude can give, my wishes, take:
Upon your hearts may no affliction prey,
Which cannot by the stage be chas'd away;
And may the stage, to please each virtuous
mind,

Grow ev'ry day more moral, more refin'd,
Refin'd from grossness, not by foreign skill:
Weed out the poison, but be English still!

To all my brethren whom I leave behind,
Still may your bounty, as to me, be kind;
To me for many years your favours flow'd,
Humbly receiv'd—on small desert bestow'd:
For which I feel—what cannot be express'd—Words are too weak—my tears must speak the rest.

§ 72. *Prologue to the Good-natured Man. 1768.
JOHNSON.*

PREST by the load of life the weary mind
Surveys the gen'ral toil of human kind,
With cool submission joins the lab'ring train,
And social sorrow loses half its pain:
Our anxious bard without complaint may share
This bustling season's epidemic care;
Like Cæsar's pilot dignified by fate,
Tost in one common storm with all the great;

* The last scene of Lady Macbeth.

Distrest alike the statesman and the wit,
When one a Borough courts, and one the Pit.
The busy candidates for power and fame
Have hopes, and fears, and wishes just the same:
Disabled both to combat or to fly,
Must hear all taunts, and hear without reply.
Uncheck'd on both loud rabbles vent their rage,
As mongrels bay the lion in a cage.
Th' offended burgess hoards his angry tale,
For that blest year when all that vote may rail;
Their schemes of spite the poet's foes dismiss,
Till that glad night when all that hate may hiss.

“This day the powder'd curls and golden coat,”

Says swelling Crispin, “begg'd a cobbler's vote;

“This night our wit,” the pert apprentice
cries,

“Lies at my feet; I hiss him, and he dies.”

The great, 'tis true, can charm the electing tribe;

The bard may supplicate, but cannot bribe.

Yet judg'd by those whose voices ne'er were sold,

He feels no want of all-persuading gold;

But confident of praise, if praise be due,

Trusts without fear to merit and to you.

§ 73. Prologue to False Delicacy. 1768. Spoken by Mr King. GARRICK.

I'M vex'd—quite vex'd—and you'll be vex'd
—that's worse—

To deal with stubborn scribblers—there's the curse.

Write moral plays—the blockhead!—why,
good people,

You'll soon expect this house to wear a steeple!

For our fine piece, to let you into facts,

Is quite a sermon—only preach'd in acts.

You'll scarce believe me, till the proof appears;

But even I, Tom Fool, must shed some tears;

Do, ladies, look upon me—nay, no simpering;

Think you this face was ever made for whim-p'ring?

Can I a cambric handkerchief display,

Thump my unfeeling breast, and roar away?

Why this is comical, perhaps you'll say.

Resolving this strange awkward bard to pump,

I ask'd him what he meant?—He, somewhat plump,

New-purs'd his belly, and his lips thus biting—

“I must keep up the dignity of writing!”—

“You may; but if you do, sir, I must tell ye,

You'll not keep up that dignity of belly.”

Still he preach'd on—“Bards of the former age

Held up abandon'd pictures on the stage;

Spread out their wit with fascinating art,

And catch'd the fancy, to corrupt the heart:

But, happy change! in these more moral days,

You cannot sport with virtue, even in plays;

On virtue's side his pen the poet draws,

And boldly asks a hearing for his cause.”

Thus did he prance and swell.—The man may prate,

And feed these whimsies in his addle pate,

That you'll protect his Muse because she's good:
 A virgin, and so chaste!—O lud! O lud!
 No muse the critic beadle's lash escapes;
 Though virtuous, if a dowdy and a trapes:
 If his come forth a decent likely lass,
 You'll speak her fair, and grant the proper pass:
 Or should his brain be turn'd with wild pretences,
 In three hours time you'll bring him to his senses;
 And well you may, when in your pow'r you get
     him;
 In that short space, you blister, bleed, and sweat him.
 Among the Turks, indeed, he'd run no danger;
 They sacred hold a madman and a stranger.

§ 74. Scrub's Trip to the Jubilee. 1769.
Spoken by Mr. Weston.

FROM Stratford arriv'd—piping hot—gentle-folks,
 From the rarest of shows, and most wonderful jokes,
 Your simple acquaintance, Scrub, comes to declare,
 'Twas fuller, by far, than our Lichfield great fair;
 Such crowd of fine ladies serenading and singing,
 Such firing of loud patereroes, and ringing—
 To tell it in London, must seem all a fable;
 And yet I will tell it—as well as I'm able.
 First, something, in lingo of schools call'd an ode;
 All critics, they told me, allow'd very good:
 One said—you may take it for truth, I assure ye,
 'Twas made by the little great man of Old Drury,
 By my brother Martin (for whose sake, d'ye hear?)
 This night I'd a mind for a touch at Shaks-peare*;
 But, honestly speaking, I take more delight in
 A bit of good fun, than drums, trumpets, and fighting.
 The procession, 'twas said, would have been a fine train,
 But could not move forward—O la—for the rain!
 Such tragical, comical folks, and so fine—
 What pity it was that the sun did not shine!
 Since ladies, and baronets, aldermen, squires,
 All went to this jubilee full of desires,
 In crowds, as they go for to see a new play;
 And when it was done—why, they all came
     away!
 Don't let me forget—a main part of the show,
 Was long-tail'd fine comets, by fam'd Angelo.
 Some turtle I got, which they call'd paspapee;
 But honest roast beef's the best turtle for me.
 I hate all ragouts; and, like a bold Briton,
 Prefer good plum pudding to aught I e'er bit on.
 I drank too (and now I a poet may be)
 From a charming fine cup of the mulberry-tree,
 To bed I must go—for which, like a ninny,
 I paid like my betters, no less than a guinea,
 For rolling—not sleeping—in linen so damp,
 As struck my great toe, ever since, with the cramp.

* This alludes to Mr. Weston's design of playing Richard.

Thus fleec'd—in my pocket I felt a great smart-
     ing,
 Yet griev'd not when I and the splinters were parting,
 'Twas worth ten times more to hear sweet brother Martin.
 He spoke, 'till poor Scrub was just fit, with one eye
 To laugh, while the other was ready to cry;
 Which makes me now tell you, without any brag,
 He's a second to none but the Warwickshire
     wag.
 The Jubilee over, I came to this place,
 To tell you my story, and sue for your grace:
 You never refus'd it—yet never before,
 With granting such kindness, bound gratitude
     more.
 I live but to own, with a diligent spirit,
 Your favors have ever outrun my slight merit.

§ 75. Prologue to Doctor Last in his Chariot.
 1769. Spoken by Mr. Foote. GARRICK.

YOUR servant, kind masters, from bottom
     to top,
 Be assur'd while I breathe, or can stand—I mean hop;
 Be you pleased to smile, or be pleased to grumble,
 Be whatever you please, I am still your most humble.
 As to laugh is a right only given to man,
 To keep up that right is my pride and my plan.
 Fair ladies, don't frown; I meant woman too:
 What's common to man, must be common to
     you.
 You all have a right your sweet muscles to curl,
 From the old smirking prude to the titt'ring
     young girl;
 And ever with pleasure my brains I could spin,
 To make you all giggle, and you, ye gods, grin.
 In this present summer, as well as the past,
 To your favor again we present Dr. Last,
 Who, by wonderful feats, in the papers recounted,
 From trudging on foot to his chariot is mounted.
 Amongst the old Britons when war was begun,
 Charioteers would slay ten, while the foot
     could slay one.
 So when doctors on wheels with dispatches are sent,
 Mortality bills rise a thousand per cent.
 But think not to physic that quackery's confin'd;
 All the world is a stage, and the quacks are mankind:
 There's trade, law, and state 'quacks: nay,
     would we but search,
 We should find—Heaven bless us!—some quacks in the church!
 The stiff band and stiff bob of the Methodist
     race,
 Give the balsam of life and the tincture of grace;
 And their poor wretched patients think much good is done 'em,
 Though blisters and caustics are ever upon 'em.

As for laws and the state, if quackery's a curse,
Which will make the good bad, and the bad
will make worse,
We should point out the quack from the regular brother;
They are wiser than I who can tell one from
t' other!
Can the stage with its bills, puffs, and patients stand trial?
Shall we find out no quacks in the Theatre-Royal?
Some dramatical drugs, that are puff'd on the
town,
Cause many wry faces, and scarce will go down.
Nay, an audience sometimes will in quack'ry delight,
And sweat down an author some pounds in one
night.
To return to our quack—should he, help'd by
the weather,
Raise laughter and kind perspiration together;
Should his nostrums of hip and of vapours but cure ye,
His chariot he well can deserve, I assure ye:
'Tis easy to set up a chariot in town,
And easier still is that chariot laid down.
He petitions by me, both as doctor and lover,
That you'll not stop his wheels, or his chariot tip over.
Fix him well, I beseech you; the worst on't would be,
Should you overturn him, you may upset me.

§ 76. Epilogue to the Duellist. 1773. Spoken by Miss Barsanti.

So, men of valour! you dislike our play:
Nothing against it do the ladies say.
To own they're pleas'd the critics ever loath,
Mutter, "A Duellist, with scarce an oath!
'Tis like his hat that was without a feather;
Duels and dammes always go together."
Old sinners, loving the licentious joke,
May think there wants too, here and there, a stroke;
Round oaths and double meanings strew'd between,
With them the virtues of the comic scene,
And yet the town in gen'ral is so nice,
It holds these virtues as a kind of vice:
From the teeth outwards chaste, their hands
before 'em,
Like reps, even demi-reps, are all decorum.
Though gross their thoughts, so delicate their
hearing,
They think the very stage should fine for swearing;
Our author therefore scrupled to employ
Your vulgar Damme, sir! and Damme, boy!
Nay, when by chance a naughty joke came pat in,
He wrapt it up, you know, in lawyer's Latin.
So much refin'd the scene since former days,
When Congreve, Vanburgh, Wycherley wrote
plays,

"The stage so loosely did Astrea tread,
She fairly put all characters to bed."
Though now no bard would venture to deposit
A macaroni in a lady's closet;
Lest the frail fair-one he be thought to ruin,
"While moon and stars alone" see what they're doing.
In the old plays, gallants take no denial,
But put the struggling actress to the trial.
Bless me! I shudder even now to think,
How near myself may come to danger's brink!
In modern plays more safe the female station
Secure as our sad solemn situation!
No rakish forward spark dares now be rude,
The Comic Muse herself's grown quite a prude!
No wonder, then, if in so pure an age
No Congreves write for as demure a stage!

§ 77. Prologue to The School for Rakes. 1774.
Spoken by Mr. King. GARRICK.

THE scribbling gentry ever frank and free,
To sweep the stage with prologues, fix on me,
A female representative I come,
And with a prologue, which I call a broom,
To sweep the critic cobwebs from the room.
Critics, like spiders, into corners creep,
And at new plays their bloody revels keep:
With some small venom close in ambush lie,
Ready to seize the poor dramatic fly:
The weak and heedless soon become their prey,
But the strong blue-bottle will force its way,
Clean well its wings, and hum another day.
Unknown to nature's laws, we've here one evil;
For flies, turn'd spiders, play the very devil!
Fearing some danger, I will lay before ye
A short, true, recent, tragi-comic story.
As late I saunter'd in the Park for air,
As free from thought as any coxcomb there,
Two sparks came up; one whisper'd in my ear,
He was a critic; then ask'd me, with a sneer—
Thus standing, staring—with a swaggering swing,
"You've writ a farce?"—"Yes, Sir, a foolish
thing:"
"Damn'd foolish—You'd better mind your acting, King.
'Tis ten to one—I speak it for your sake,
That this same farce will prove—your wit's
last Stake."—
"I scribble for amusement, boast no pow'rs."—
"Write for your own amusement, not for ours."
Thus he went on; and with his pleasant talking,
I lost the appetite I got with walking.
He laugh'd—I how'd—but ere I could retreat,
His lisping friend did thus the dose repeat:
"Pray, Sir,—this School for Rakes—the woman's play—
When do you give it us?"—"Next Saturday.
I hope you'll both be kind to her, at least."
"A scribbling woman is a dreadful beast!
Then they're so ugly, all the female wits—
I'll damn her play—to throw her into fits.

Had I my will, those slattern sluttish dames—
They all should see the bottom of the Thames."

If you are here, good Sirs, to breed a riot,
[Looking about the house.]

Don't show your spite; for if you are not quiet,
'Tis ten to one—I speak it for your sake,
This School for Rakes will prove your Wit's
last Stake:

As you [To the Pit] save me from their tyrannic will,

You will not let them use a woman ill.
Protect her and her brat—the truly brave
Women and children will for ever save.

§ 78. Prologue to the Jubilee. 1769. Spoken by Mr. King in the Character of a Waiter.

GARRICK.

FROM London, your honors, to Stratford I'm come:

I'm a waiter, your honors; you know bustling Tom;

Who, proud of your orders, and bowing before ye,

Till supper is ready, I'll tell ye a story.

'Twixt Hounslow and Colnbrook, two houses of fame,

Well known on that road, the two Magpies by name:

The one of long standing, the other a new one;
This boasts it's the old one, and that it's the true one.

Sure we, the old Magpie, as well as the younger,
May boast that our liquor is clearer and stronger.
Of bragging and puffing you make but a jest;
You taste of us both and will stick to the best.
A race we have had for your pastime and laughter;

Young Mag started first, with old Mag hopping after.

'Tis said the old house hath possess'd a receipt
To make a choice mixture of sour, strong, and sweet;

A Jubilee punch, which, right skilfully made,
Insur'd the old Magpie a good running trade:
But think you we mean to monopolize?—No,
no,

We are like brother Ashley, pro publico bono,
Each Magpie, your honours, will pick at his brother,

And their natures were always to 'crib from each other.

Young landlords and old ones are taught by their calling

To laugh at engrossing—but practise forestall—
Our landlords are game-cocks, and fair play but grant 'em,

I'll warrant you pastime from each little bantam.

Let's return to the punch—I hope from my soul,

That now the old Magpie may sell you a bowl.
We have all sorts and sizes, a quick trade to drive,

As one shilling, two shilling, three shilling, five:

In this town of Stratford we'll have each ingredient,

Beside a kind welcome from me, your obedient.
I'll now squeeze my fruit, put sugar and rum in, [coming, a coming, a coming!]
And be back in a moment [Bell rings] A

§ 79. Prologue to the Christmas Tale. 1774.
GARRICK.

Music plays, and enter several persons with different kinds of dishes.

Enter Mr. Palmer in the Character of Christmas.

Go on—prepare my bounty for my friends,
And see that Mirth, with all her crew, attends.
To the Audience.

Behold a personage, well known to fame,
Once lov'd and honor'd—Christmas is my name!

My officers of state my taste display;
Cooks, scullions, pastry-cooks, prepare my way;
Holly and ivy round me honors spread,
And my retinue show—I'm not ill-fed;
Minc'd pies, by way of belt, my breast divide,
And a large carving-knife adorns my side,
'Tis no fop's weapon, 't will be often drawn:
This turban for my head—is collar'd brawn.
Though old, and white my locks, my cheeks are cherry:

Warm'd by good fires, good cheer, I'm always merry,

With carol, fiddle, dance, and pleasant tale,
Jest, gibe, prank, gambol, mummery, and ale,
I English hearts rejoic'd in days of yore;
For new strange modes, imported by the score,
You will not sure turn Christmas out of door!
Suppose yourselves well seated by a fire,
(Stuck close, you seem more warm than you desire)

Old Father Christmas, now in all his glory,
Begs with kind hearts you'll listen to his story;
Clear well your thoughts from politics and spleen,

Hear my tale out, see all that's to be seen,
Take care, my children, that you well behave:
You, Sir, in blue, red cape, not quite so grave:
That critic there in black—so stern and thin,
Before you frown, pray let the tale begin—
You in the crimson capuchin, I fear you;
Why, madam, at this time so cross appear you?
Excuse me, pray—I did not see your husband near you.

Don't think, fair ladies, I expect that you
Should hear my tale—you've something else to do;

Nor will our beaux old English fair encourage;
No foreign taste could e'er digest plum-porridge.
I have no sauce to quicken lifeless sinners;
My food is meant for honest hearty grinners.
For you, your spirits with good stomachs bring,
O make the neighb'ring roof with rapture ring:
Open your mouths, pray, swallow every thing!
Critics, beware how you our pranks despise;
Hear well my tale, or you shan't touch my pies;
The proverb change—Be merry but not wise.

§ 80. Prologue to the Maid of the Oaks.
1774. Spoken by Mr. King in the Character of Fame. GARRICK.

UNLIKE to ancient Fame, all eyes, tongues,
ears,

See modern Fame, arm'd cap-a-pie, appears,
In ledgers, chronicles, gazettes, and gazetteers!
My soaring wings are fine election speeches,
And puffs of candidates supply my breeches.
My cap is satire, criticism, wit—
Is there a head that wants it in the pit?

[Offering it.]

No flowing robe and trumpet me adorn;
I wear a jacket, and I wind a horn.
Pipe, song, and pastoral, for five months past,
Puff'd well by me, have been the general taste.
Now Marybone shines forth to gaping crowds;
Now Highgate glitters from her hill of clouds;
St. George's Fields, with taste and fashion struck,

Display Arcadia at the Dog and Duck:
And Drury Misses here, "in tawdry pride,
Are there Pastoras by the fountain side."

To frowsy bow'rs they reel through midnight
damps,

With Fauns half drunk, and Dryads breaking lamps.

Both far and near did this new whimsy run,
One night it frisk'd, forsooth, at Islington.
And now, as for the public bound to cater,
Our manager must have his fête champêtre.
How is the weather?—Pretty clear and bright.

[Looking about.]

A storm's the devil on champêtre night!
Lest it should fall to spoil the author's scenes,
I'll catch this gleam, to tell you what he means:
He means a show as brilliant as at Cox's,
Laugh for the pit, and may be at the boxes;
Song, chorus, frolic, dance, and rural play,
The merry-making of a wedding day.

Whose is the piece?—'Tis all surmise, suggestion—

[tion.]

Is't his, or hers, or yours, Sir? That's the ques-
The parent, bashful, whimsical, or poor,
Left it a puling infant at the door;

'Twas laid on flow'rs, and wrapp'd in fancied
cloaks,

And on the breast was written—Maid o' the Oaks.

The actors crowded round—the girls caress'd
it:

[bless'd it;

Lord! the sweet pretty babe!—they prais'd and
The master peep'd, smil'd, took it in, and dress'd it.

Whate'er its birth, protect it from the curse
Of being smother'd by a parish nurse:

As you're kind, rear it—if you're curious, praise
it:

And ten to one but vanity betrays it.

§ 81. Occasional Prologue, upon Mr. Lacy's
first Appearance in the Character of Alexan- der. GARRICK.

IN Macedon when Alexander reign'd,
And victory after victory was gain'd;

The Greek Gazettes (for they had papers there),
Publish'd a thousand fibs—as they do here,
From them one Curtius wrote of Philip's son,
How he did things—which never could be
Unlike his copy, who will soon appear, [done!
His mighty soul ne'er knew the smallest fear:
Tho' laurel-crown'd our pale young monarch comes

Trembling amidst his triumphs, shouts, and drums;

Would give up all his vict'ries, false or true,
To gain one greater conquest—that of you.

"Lord!" cries a buxom widow, loud and
strong,

He's quite a boy! to play that part is wrong."

"Madam, he's six feet high, and cannot be too young."

"He looks so modest, hardly speaks a word:
Can he with proper spirit draw his sword? [is,
A face so smooth where neither rage nor pride
Fits not the hero."—Fronti nulla fides.—

In English thus: Trust not to looks, they'll cheat us:

Bounc'd not Sir Swagger lately, as he'd beat us?
And was not he, with all his frowns and airs,
By one who seem'd all meekness, kick'd down stairs?

Miss B—, all delicacy, nerve, and fear,
Elop'd last week with a horse grenadier!

And our advent'rer, through so mild and civil,
If you once rouse him, plays the very devil!

"Indeed!" cries madam, "Sir, I'm much your debtor;

I should be glad to know the young man better."

Twice our young hero, who for glory tow'rs,
In fields less dang'rous tried his unknown
pow'rs,

Like a young swimmer, whom his fears command,

In shallow streams first ventur'd from the land,
Till, bolder grown, the rougher wave he stems,
Plunges from giddy heights into the Thames.

E'en now he starts to hear the torrent roar,
While his pale fates stand frighted on the shore!

Soon will he leap the precipice—Your nod
Sinks him, or lifts him to a demi-god.

§ 82. Prologue spoken by Mr. Yates, on open- habitants of Birmingham. FOOTE.

FROM fiddling, fretting, monsieur, and signor,
And all the dangers of the Italian shore;

From squeaking monarchs and chromatic
queens,

And Metastasio's mix'd and mangled scenes,
Where Fashion, and not Feeling, bears the
sway,

Whilst Sense and Nature coyly keep away,
I come.—All hail the consecrated earth,*

Whose bounteous bosom gave our Shakspeare birth!

Gave that great master of the scenic art
To feed the fancy, and correct the heart;

* Shakspeare was born in Warwickshire.

To check th' unruly passions' wild career,
And draw from Pity's eye the tender tear;
Of Folly's sons t' explore the ample train,
The sot, the fop, the vicious, and the vain;
Hypocrisy to drag from her disguise,
And Affectation hunt through all her lies:
Such was your bard. Who then can deem the stage,

The worthless fav'rite of an idle age?
Or judge that pleasure, with instruction join'd,
Can soil the manners, or corrupt the mind?
Far other thoughts your generous breasts inspire,
Touch'd with a spark of true Promethean fire:
Sure that the Arts with Commerce came to earth,
That the same parents gave those sisters birth,
Cold creeping Prejudice you dar'd despise,
And bade this temple to the muses rise.
O that my tongue could utter all I feel!
Or that my powers were equal to my zeal!
Placed by your favor, not by right divine,
Th' unworthy high priest of the sacred nine,
No tainted incense should pollute their shrine,
Nor aught be offer'd to the public view,
But what was worthy them—and worthy you.

§ 83. Prologue to Bon Ton. 1775. COLMAN.

FASHION in every thing bears sovereign sway,
And words and periwigs have both their day;
Each have their purlieus too, are modish each,
In stated districts, wigs as well as speech.
The Tyburn scratch, thick club, and Temple tie;
The parson's feather-top, frizz'd broad and high;
The coachman's cauliflower, built tiers on tiers;
Differ not more from bags and brigadiers,
Than great St. George's or St. James's styles
From the broad dialect of Broad St. Giles.

What is Bon Ton?—"O, damme!" cries a buck, [luck:
Half drunk—"ask me, my dear, and you're in Bon Ton's to swear, break windows, beat the watch, [catch.
Pick up a wench, drink healths, and roar a Keep it up! keep it up! damme, take your swing! [thing!"]

Bon Ton is life, my boy; Bon Ton's the
"Ah! I loves life, and all the joys it yields,"
Says Madame Fussock, warm from Spitalfields,
"Bon Ton's the space 'twixt Saturday and Monday,

And riding in a one-horse chair o' Sunday!
'Tis drinking tea, on summer afternoons,
At Bagnigge Wells, with china and gilt spoons!
'Tis laying by our stuffs, red cloaks, and pattens,
To dance cowtillions all in silks and satins!"
"Vulgar!" cries Miss—"Observe, in higher life, [wife:
The feather'd spinster, and thrice-feather'd
The Club's Bon Ton. Bon Ton's a constant
Of rout, festino, ball, and masquerade! [trade
'Tis plays and puppet-shows—"Tis something
'Tis losing thousands every night at lu! [new;
Nature it thwarts, and contradicts all reason,
'Tis stiff French stays, and fruit when out of season!

A rose, when half-a-guinea is the price;
A set of bays scarce bigger than six mice:
To visit friends—you never wish to see;
Marriage 'twixt those who never can agree.
Old dowagers, dress'd, painted, patch'd, and curl'd—

This is Bon Ton, and this we call the world!"
"True," says my lord, "and thou, my only son. [Ton!

Whate'er your faults, ne'er sin against Bon
Who toils for learning at a public school,
And digs for Greek and Latin, is a fool.
French, French, my boy, 's the thing! jasez!
prate, chatter!

Trim be the mode, whipt-syllabub the matter!
Walk like a Frenchman; for, on English pegs
Moves native awkwardness with two left legs.
Of courtly friendship form a treacherous league, Seduce men's daughters, with their wives intrigue;

In sightly semicircles round your nails, [fails:
Keep your teeth clean—and grin, if small-talk
But never laugh, whatever jest prevails:
Nothing but nonsense e'er gave laughter birth,
That vulgar way the vulgar show their mirth.
Laughter's a rude convulsion, sense that justles,
Disturbs the cockles, and distorts the muscles.
Hearts may be black, but all should wear clean
faces;

The graces, boy! The graces, graces, graces!"

Such is Bon Ton! and walk this city through,
In building, scribbling, fighting, and virtu,
And various other shapes, 'twill rise to view:
To-night our Bayes, with bold but careless tints,
Hits off a sketch or two, like Darly's prints.
Should connoisseurs allow his rough draughts strike 'em,

'Twill be Bon Ton to see 'em, and to like 'em.

§ 84. Prologue to the Rivals. 1775.

SHERIDAN.

Enter Sergeant at Law, and Attorney following and giving a Paper.

Serj. WHAT's here?—a vile cramp hand!
I cannot see

Without my spectacles. Att. He means his Nay, Mr. Serjeant, good sir, try again. [fee.
[Gives Money.

Serj. The scrawl improves—[more.] O come, 'tis pretty plain.

Hey; how's this?—Dibble!—sure it cannot be!
A poet's brief! a poet—and a fee!

Att. Yea, sir! though you without reward,
I know,

Would gladly plead the muses' cause—Serj.
So, so!

Att. And if the fee offends, your wrath should fall

On me—Serj. Dear Dibble, no offence at all.

Att. Some sons of Phœbus in the Courts we meet—

Serj. And fifty sons of Phœbus in the Fleet!

Att. Nor pleads he worse, who, with a decent sprig

Of bays, adorns his legal waste of wig.

Serj. Full-bottom'd heroes thus on signs unfurl
A leaf of laurel in a grove of curl!
Yet tell your client, that, in adverse days,
This wig is warmer than a bush of bays.

Att. Do you then, sir, my client's place sup-
Profuse of robe, and prodigal of tie— [ply,
Do you, with all those blushing powers of face,
And wonted bashful hesitating grace,
Rise in the court, and flourish on the case.

[Exit.

Serj. For practice then suppose—this brief will show it—
Me, Serjeant Woodward—counsel for the poet.
Us'd to the ground—I know 'tis hard to deal
With this dread Court, from whence there's no appeal;

No tricking here to blunt the edge of law,
Or damn'd in equity—escape by flaw;
But judgement given—your sentence must remain;

No writ of error lies—to Drury-lane!

Yet when so kind you seem, 'tis past dispute
We gain some favor, if not costs of suit.
No spleen is here! I see no hoarded fury;
I think I never fac'd a milder jury!
Sad else our plight!—where frowns are transportation,

A hiss the gallows—and a groan damnation!
But such the public candor, without fear
My client waves all right of challenge here.
No newsman from our session is dismiss'd,
Nor wit nor critic we scratch off the list;
His faults can never hurt another's ease,
His crime at worst—a bad attempt to please:
Thus, all respecting he appeals to all,
And by the general voice will stand or fall.

§ 85. Epilogue to the same. 1775. SHERIDAN.

LADIES, for you—I heard our poet say,
He'd try to coax some moral from his play;
“One moral's plain,” cried I, “without more
Man's social happiness all rests on us: [fuss;
Through all the drama, whether damn'd or not,
Love gilds the scene, and women guide the plot.
From ev'ry rank obedience is our due:
D'ye doubt?—the world's great stage shall prove it true.”

The cit, well skill'd to shun domestic strife,
Will sup abroad; but first—he'll ask his wife.
John Trot, his friend, for once will do the same;
But then—he'll just step home to tell his dame.

The surly squire at noon resolves to rule,
And half the day—Zounds! Madam is a fool!
Convinc'd at night, the vanquish'd victor says,
Ah, Kate! you women have such coaxing ways!

The jolly toper chides each tardy blade,
Till reeling Bacchus calls on love for aid:
Then with each toast he sees fair bumpers swim,
And kisses Chloe on the sparkling brim!

Nay, I have heard that statesmen, great and
wise,
Will sometimes counsel with a lady's eyes;

The servile suitors watch her various face,
She smiles preferment—or she frowns disgrace,
Curtseys a pension here—there nods a place.

Nor, with less awe, in scenes of humbler life,
Is view'd the mistress, or is heard the wife.
The poorest peasant of the poorest soil,
The child of poverty, and heir to toil,
Early from radiant love's impartial light Steals one small spark to cheer his world of
night;

[woes,

Dear spark! that oft, through winter's chilling
Is all the warmth his little cottage knows!

The wand'ring tar—who not for years has
press'd

The widow'd partner of his day of rest,
On the cold deck, far from her arms remov'd,
Still hums the ditty which his Susan lov'd:
And while around the cadence rude is blown,
The boatswain whistles in a softer tone.

The soldier, fairly proud of wounds and toil,
Pants for the triumph of his Nancy's smile;
But ere the battle, should he list her cries,
The lover trembles—and the hero dies!
That heart, by war and honor steel'd to fear,
Droops on a sigh, and sickens at a tear!

But ye more cautious—ye nice-judging few,
Who give to beauty only beauty's due,
Though friends to Love—ye view with deep regret

Our conquests marr'd, and triumphs incomplete,
Till polish'd wit more lasting charms disclose,
And judgement fix the darts which beauty throws.

In female breasts did sense and merit rule,
The lover's mind would ask no other school;
Sham'd into sense—the scholars of our eyes,
Our beaux from gallantry would soon be wise;
Would gladly light, their homage to improve,
The lamp of knowledge at the torch of love!

§ 86. Epilogue to Edward and Eleonora. 1775.
SHERIDAN.

YE wedded critics,* who have mark'd our tale,
How say you? does our plot in nature fail?
May we not boast that many a modern wife
Would lose her own, to save a husband's life?
Would gladly die—O monstrous and ill bred!
There's not a husband here but shakes his head!

But you, my gall'ry friends†—come, what say you? [too!

Your wives are with you—shake their noddles
Above there—hey, lads!‡ You'll not treat us so— [No!

You side with us?—They grin and grumble
Yet hold—though these plain folks traduce their doxies,

Sure we have Eleonoras in the boxes! [sneer?
Inhuman beaux!—why that ill-natur'd
What, then, you think there's no such idiot
here? [know,

There are, no doubt, though rare to find, I
Who could lose husbands, yet survive the blow.
Two years a wife—view Lesbia, sobbing, cry-
Her chair is waiting, but my Lord is dying: [ing]

* To the Pit.

† First Gallery.

‡ Upper Gallery.

Preparing for the worst, she tells her maid
To countermand her points and new brocade ;
“ For, O! if I should lose the best of men,
Heaven knows when I shall see the Club again.
So, Lappet, should he die when I am out,
You'll send for me at Lady Basto's rout:
The doctor said he might hold out till three,
But I ha'n't spirits for the Coterie !”

Now change the scene—place madam in the fever,

My lord for comfort at the Sçavoir Vivre ;
His valet enters—shakes his meagre head—“ Chapeau, what news?—Ah! sir, my lady's dead.”

“ The duce!—'tis sudden, faith—but four days
sick!—

Well, seven's the main—(poor Kate!)— eleven's a nick.”

But hence reflections on a senseless train,
Who, lost to real joy, should feel no pain ;
'Mongst Britain's daughters still can Hymen's
light

Reveal the love which charm'd your hearts to-
night ;

Show beauteous martyrs, who would each pre-
To die for him, who long has liv'd for her ;
Domestic heroines, who with fondest care
Outsmile a husband's griefs, or claim a share ;
Search where the rankling evils most abound,
And heal with cherub-lip the poison'd wound.

Nay, such bright virtues in a royal mind,
Were not alone to Edward's days confin'd ;
Still, still they beam around Britannia's throne,
And grace an Eleonora of our own.

§ 87. Prologue to Braganza. MURPHY.

WHILE, in these days of sentiment and grace,
Poor comedy in tears resigns her place,
And, smit with novels full of maxims crude,
She that was frolic once now turns a prude ;
To her great end the tragic muse aspires,
At Athens born, and faithful to her sires.

The comic sister in hysteric fit,
You'd swear, has lost her memory of wit ;
Folly for her may now exult on high ;
Feather'd by ridicule, no arrows fly ;
But, if you are distress'd she's sure to cry.
She that could jig, and nick-name all heaven's creatures,

With sorrows not her own deforms her features ;
With stale reflections keeps a constant pother ;
Greece gave her one face, and she makes
another—

So very pious, and so full of woe,
You well may bid her, “ To a nunnery go.”

Not so Melpomene ; to nature true,
She holds her own great principle in view.
She, from the first, when men her pow'r con-
fess'd,

When grief and terror seiz'd the tortur'd breast,
She made, to strike her moral to the mind,
The stage the great tribunal of mankind.

Hither the worthies of each clime she draws,
Who founded states, or rescued dying laws ;
Who, in base times, a life of glory led,
And for their country who have toil'd or bled,

Hither they come—again they breathe, they live,

And virtue's meed through every age receive.

Hither the murd'rer comes, with ghastly mien,
And the fiend conscience hunts him o'er the
None are exempted ; all must re-appear, [scene.
And even kings attend for judgement here ;
Here find the day, when they their pow'r abuse,
Is a scene furnish'd to the tragic muse.

Such is her art ; weaken'd perhaps at length,
And, while she aims at beauty, losing strength
Oh! when, resuming all her native rage,
Shall her true energy alarm the stage? [high—

This night a bard (our hopes may rise too
'Tis yours to judge, 'tis yours the cause to try)—
This night a bard, as yet unknown to fame,
Once more, we hope, will rouse a genuine
flame.

His no French play—tame, polish'd, dull by rule :

Vigorous he comes, and warm from Shakspeare's
Inspir'd by him, he shows in glaring light
A nation struggling with tyrannic might ;
Oppression rushing on with giant strides ;
A deep conspiracy, which virtue guides ;
Heroes, for freedom who dare strike the blow,
A tablature of honor, guilt, and woe.

If on his canvass nature's colors shine, [sign.
You'll praise the hand that trac'd the just de-

§ 88. Epilogue by Mr. Garrick on quitting the Stage, June, 1776.

A VETERAN see! whose last act on the stage
Entreats your smiles for sickness and for age ;
Their cause I plead—plead it in heart and mind ;
A fellow-feeling makes one wondrous kind :
Might we but hope your zeal would not be less,
When I am gone, to patronize distress,
That hope obtain'd the wish'd-for end secures,
To soothe their cares who oft have lighten'd
Shall the great heroes of celestial line, [yours.
Who drank full bowls of Greek and Roman
wine,

Cæsar and Brutus, Agamemnon, Hector,
Nay, Jove himself, who here has quaff'd his nectar!

Shall they who govern fortune, cringe and
Thirst in their age, and call in vain for porter?
Like Belisarius tax the pitying street
With date obolum to all they meet?

Sha'n't I, who oft have drench'd my hands in gore ;

Stabb'd many, poison'd some, beheaded more ;
Who numbers slew in battle on this plain—
Sha'n't I, the slayer, try to feed the slain?

Brother to all, with equal love I view
The men who slew me, and the men I slew :
I must, I will this happy project seize,

That those too old to die may live with ease.
Suppose the babes I smother'd in the Tow'r,
By chance, or sickness, lose their acting-pow'r,
Shall they, once princes, worse than all be serv'd—

In childhood murder'd, and, when murder'd starv'd?

Matrons half ravish'd for your recreation,
 In age should never want some consolation.
 Can I, young Hamlet once, to nature lost,
 Behold, O horrible! my father's ghost,
 With grisly beard, pale cheek, stalk up and
     down,
 And he, the royal Dane, want half a crown?
 Forbid it, ladies! gentlemen, forbid it!
 Give joy to age, and let 'em say—you did it.
 To you, ye gods! * I make my last appeal;
 You have a right to judge, as well as feel;
 Will your high wisdoms to our scheme incline,
 That kings, queens, heroes, gods, and ghosts
     may dine?
 Olympus shakes!—that omen all secures;
 May every joy you give be tenfold yours!

§ 89. Prologue to the Capuchin. 1776.
Spoken by Mr. Foote. COLMAN.

CRITICS, whene'er I write, in ev'ry scene
 Discover meanings that I never mean;
 Whatever character I bring to view,
 I am the father of the child, 'tis true,
 But ev'ry babe his christ'ning owes to you.
 "The comic poet's eye, with humorous air
 Glancing from Watling-street to Grosvenor-
     square,

He bodies forth a light ideal train,
 And turns to shape the phantoms of his brain:
 Meanwhile your fancy takes more partial aim,
 And gives to airy nothing place and name."

A limner once, in want of work, went down
 To try his fortune in a country town:
 The waggon loaded with his goods, convey'd
 To the same spot his whole dead stock in trade,
 Originals and copies—ready made.
 To the new painter all the country came;
 Lord, lady, doctor, lawyer, squire and dame,
 The humble curate, and the curate's wife,
 All ask a likeness—taken from the life.
 Behold the canvass on the easel stand!
 A pallet grac'd his thumb, and brushes fill'd
     his hand:

But, ah! the painter's skill they little knew,
 Nor by what curious rules of art he drew.
 The waggon-load unpack'd, his ancient store
 Furnish'd for each a face drawn long before,
 God, dame, or hero, of the days of yore.
 The Cæsars, with a little alteration,
 Were turn'd into the mayor and corporation:
 To represent the rector and the dean,
 He added wigs and bands to Prince Eugene:
 The ladies, blooming all, deriv'd their faces
 From Charles the Second's beauties, and the Graces.

Thus done, and circled in a splendid frame,
 His works adorn'd each room, and spread his
     fame;

The countrymen of taste admire and stare,
 "My lady's leer! Sir John's majestic air!
 Miss Dimple's languish too!—extremely like!
 And in the style and manner of Vandyke!
 O this new limner's pictures always strike!"

* To the Upper Gallery.

Old, young; fat, lean; dark, fair; or big or
 "The very man or woman to a tittle!" [little,
 Foote and this limner in some points agree,
 And thus, good sirs, you often deal by me.
 When, by the royal licence and protection,
 I show my small academy's collection,
 The connoisseur takes out his glass to pry
 Into each picture with a curious eye;
 Turns topsy-turvy my whole composition,
 And makes mere portraits all my exhibition.
 But still the copy's so exact, you say;
 Alas! the same thing happens ev'ry day!
 How many a modish well-dress'd fop you meet,
 Exactly suits his shape in Monmouth-street;
 In Yorkshire warehouses and Cranbourn-alley,
 'Tis wonderful how shoes and feet will tally!
 As honest Crispin understands his trade,
 On the true human scale his lasts are made,
 The measure of each sex and age to hit,
 And ev'ry shoe, as if bespoke, will fit.

My warehouse thus, for nature's walks supplies
 Shoes for all ranks, and lasts of ev'ry size.
 Sit still, and try them, Sirs, I long to please
     ye—

How well they fit! I hope you find them easy:
 If the shoe pinches, swear you cannot bear it:
 But if well-made—I wish you health to wear it.

§ 90. Prologue to the Contract. 1776. *Written and intended to have been spoken by Mr.
 Foote.*

THE Contract is it call'd?—I cannot say
 I much admire the title of his play:
 Contracts, they tell me, have been fraught with evil,
 Since Faustus sign'd his contract with—the Devil.

Yet, spite of Satan, all men wish to make 'em,
 Tho' nineteen out of twenty love to break 'em.
 Butchers and mealmen, brewers, agents,
     factors,

Pimps, poets, placemen, managers and actors,
 Bawds, bankrupts, booksellers, are all contractors; [store,

All lie and swear, and cheat, t' increase their
 Then die, and go—where Faustus went before.
 While thus o'er all we see th' infection spread.
 No wonder it should taint the marriage bed:
 Each wife forgets, each husband breaks his vow;
 For what are contracts, what is wedlock now?
 Garrick, who long was married to the town,
 At length a fashionable husband grown,
 Forsakes his spouse, base man! for truth to tell,
 She lov'd her own dear Davy wondrous well;
 Though now he slights her, breaks from her by
     force,

And nought will serve him but a full divorce.
 But be the fault in women or in men,
 Thanks to our laws! they all may—wed again:
 Her faithless fav'rite gone, the lady's free
 To choose another, and may smile—on me;
 To the Lame Lover may resign her charms,
 And, though a cripple, take me to her arms.
 I'll promise to be constant, kind, polite,
 And pay my duty—ev'ry other night.

My dear lov'd rib I never will abandon,
But stand by her, whilst I've one leg to stand on.
I'll make a solemn contract, play or pay,
And hope we shall not part this many a day.

Our brother scribbler too, I greatly fear,
Has made a foolish kind of contract here;
He promises, and ten to one you're bit,
To furnish fable, sentiment, and wit.
I've seen his piece; the man appeal'd to me,
And I, as Chancellor, issued my decree; [it—
'T has pass'd the seals, they're going to rehearse
But you're the House of Peers, and may reverse it.

§ 91. Prologue to the Spleen, or Islington Spa.
Spoken by Mr. KING. 1776. GARRICK.

THOUGH prologues now as blackberries are plenty, [twenty;
And, like them, mawkish too—nineteen in
Yet you will have them when their date is o'er,
And Prologue! prologue! still your honors roar;
Till some such dismal phiz as mine comes on—
Ladies and gentlemen, indeed there's none;
The prologue, author, speaker—all are dead
and gone. [rout;

These reasons have some weight, and stop the
You clap—I smile—and thus go cringing out:
While living, call me; for your pleasure use me;
Should I tip off—I hope you'll then excuse me.
So much for prologues—and now enter Farce:
Shall I a scene, I lately heard, rehearse?

The place, the Park; the dramatis personæ,
Two female wits with each a macaroni:
“Pr'ythee, Lord Flimsey, what's this thing
at Drury—

“This Spleen?”——“'Tis low, damn'd low,
Ma'am, I'll assure you.” [evil,

“C'est vrai, my Lor!—We now feel no such “Never are haunted with a vaporish devil.

“In pleasure's round we whirl it from the brain:

“You rattle it away with, Seven's the main!

“In upper life we have no spleen or gall;

“And as for other life—it is no life at all.”

What can I say in our poor bard's behalf?

He hopes that lower life may make you laugh.

May not a trader, who shall business drop,

Quitting at once his old accusom'd shop,

In fancy through a course of pleasures run,

Retiring to his seat at Islington;

And, of false dreams of happiness brim-full,

Be at his villa miserably dull?

Would not he Islington's fine air forego,

Could he again be chok'd in Butcher-row;

In showing cloth renew his former pleasure

Surpass'd by none—but that of clipping measure?

The master of this shop, too, seeks repose*,

Sells off his stock in trade, his verse and prose,

His daggers, buskins, thunder, lightning, and old clothes.

Will he in rural shades find ease and quiet?

O no! he'll sigh for Drury, and seek peace in riot.

Nature of yore prevail'd through human kind;

To low and middle life she's now confin'd:

'Twas there the choicest dramatists have sought her; [caught her:

'Twas there Moliere, there Jonson, Shakspeare

'Then let our gleaning bard with safety come,

To pick up straws dropt from their harvest-home.

New Brooms. Spoken by Mr. KING, at the opening of Drury Lane Theatre. 1776.*

GARRICK.

SCRIBBLERS are sportsmen; and as sportsmen are, [beat fair:

Some hit, some miss, some poach, and some

This wounds a straggling bird; that often tries

But never kills, he shoots and shuts both eyes:

Like our train'd-bands, the mark he never hits;

He scorns to see the murder he commits:

Some will whole covies take, nineteen in twenty; [plenty;

And then you smack your lips—for game is

In short, by you their merits must be tried;

And woe to them who are not qualified!

Another simile we mean to broach—

A new one too!—the stage is a stage coach—

A stage-coach! why?—I'll tell you, if you ask it— [basket †

Here † some take places, and some mount the

Our cattle too, that draw the stage along,

Are of all sorts and sizes—weak and strong;

Brown, grey, black, bay, brisk, tame, blind,

lame, fat, lean, old, and young!

If, as we are jogging on, we sometimes stop,

Some scold within, and some asleep will drop,

While sailors and their doxies sing and roar

o' top. [ye—

The coachman manager will sometimes please

But should he stuff the coach too full, and squeeze ye, [door;

You then begin to swear—“Zounds! shut the

more—

“You're so damn'd fat! A little farther, Sir—

“Your elbow's in my stomach—I can't stir!”

Hoit! Hoit! the coachman then drives on apace,

And, smack! with other stages runs a race,

Through thick and thin we dash, now up, now

down, [town;

Now raise a dust, now rattling through the

Now first, now last, now jolted, crack! we fall—

Laugh'd, pelted, hooted at, and damn'd by all.

Your late old coachman, tho' oft splash'd by dirt,

And out in many a storm, retires unhurt;

Enjoys your kind reward for all his pains,

And now to other hands resigns the reins.

But the new partners of the old machine,

Hoping you'll find it snug, and tight, and clean,

Vow that with much civility they'll treat you,

Will drive you well, and pleasantly will seat you.

The road is not all turnpike—and what worse is,

They can't insure your watches, or your purses;

But they'll insure you, that their best endeavour

Shall not be wanting to obtain your favor:

Which gain'd—Gee up! the old stage will run for ever!

§ 93. Epilogue to the Runaway. 1776.
GARRICK.

Post-haste from Italy arrives my lover!
Shall I to you, good friends, my fears discover?
Should foreign modes his virtues mar and mangle,

And caro sposo prove—Sir Dingle Dangle;
No sooner join'd than separate we go;
Abroad—we never shall each other know,
At home—I mope above—he'll pick his teeth
below.

In sweet domestic chat we ne'er shall mingle,
And wedded tho' I am, shall still live single.
However modish, I detest this plan;
For me no mawkish creature, weak and wan;
He must be English—and an English man.

To nature and his country false and blind,
Should Belville dare to twist his form and mind,
I will discard him—and, to Britain true,
A Briton choose—and may be one of you—
Nay, don't be frighten'd; I am but in jest;
Freemen, in love or war, should ne'er be press'd.
If you would know my utmost expectation,
'Tis one unspoil'd by travell'd education;
With knowledge, taste, much kindness, and some whim, [him.

Good sense to govern me—and let me govern
Great love of me must keep his heart from roving;
Then I'll forgive him, if he proves too loving.
If in these times I should be bless'd by fate
With such a phoenix, such a matchless mate,
I will by kindness, and some small discerning,
Take care that Hymen's torch continues burning.
At weddings, now-a-days, the torch thrown down, [town!

Just makes a smoke, then stinks throughout the
No married Puritan, I'll follow pleasure,
And even the fashion—but in moderate mea-
I will of opera ecstasies partake, [sure;
Though I take snuff to keep myself awake:
No rampant plumes shall o'er my temples play,
Foretelling that my brains will fly away;
Nor from my head shall strange vagaries spring,
To show the soil can teem with ev'ry thing;
No fruits, roots, greens, shall fill the ample
A kitchen-garden to adorn my face! [space,
No rocks shall there be seen, no windmill,
fountain; [mountain!

Nor curls, like guns set round to guard the
O learn, ye fair, if this same madness spreads,
Not to hold up, but to keep down your heads!
Be not misled by strange fantastic Art,
But in your dress let Nature take some part:
Her skill alone a lasting pow'r insures,
And best can ornament such charms as yours.

§ 94. Epilogue to Semiramis. 1776.

SHERIDAN.

DISHEVELL'D still, like Asia's bleeding
queen,
Shall I with jests deride the tragic scene?
No, beauteous mourners!—from whose downcast eyes

The Muse has drawn her noblest sacrifice!
Whose gentle bosoms, Pity's altars—bear
The crystal incense of each falling tear!—

There lives the poet's praise!—no critic art
Can match the comment of a feeling heart!

When gen'ral plaudits speak the fable o'er,
Which mute attention had approv'd before,
Tho' ruder spirits love th' accustom'd jest
Which chases sorrow from the vulgar breast,
Still hearts refin'd their sadden'd tints retain—
The sigh is pleasure! and the jest is pain!
Scarce have they smiles to honor grace or wit,
Tho' Roscius spoke the verse himself had writ!
Thus through the time when vernal fruits receive
The grateful show'rs that hang on April's eve;
Tho' every coarser stem of forest birth [earth,
Throws with the morning-beam its dew to Ne'er does the gentle rose revive so soon—
But bath'd in nature's tears, it droops till noon.

O could the muse one simple moral teach,
From scenes like these, which all who heard might reach!

Thou child of sympathy—whoe'er thou art,
Who with Assyria's queen has wept thy part—
Go search where keener woes demand relief,
Go—while thy heart yet beats with fancied
grief:

Thy lip still conscious of the recent sigh,
The graceful tear still lingering in thy eye—
Go—and on real misery bestow
The blest effusion of fictitious woe!

So shall our Muse, supreme of all the Nine,
Deserve indeed the title of—divine!
Virtue shall own her favor'd from above,
And Pity greet her with a sister's love!

§ 95. Prologue spoken by Mr. PALMER, on the opening of the Theatre Royal in the Hay-Market, May 15, 1777. COLMAN.

PRIDE, by a thousand arts, vain honors claims,
And gives to empty nothings pompous names.
Theatric dealers thus would fain seem great,
And ev'ry playhouse grows a mighty state.
To fancied heights howe'er mock monarchs soar,
A manager's a trader—nothing more—
You (whom they court) their customers—and
then,

We play'rs—poor devils—are their journeymen.
While two great warehouses, for winter use,
Eight months huge bales of merchandise produce,

Out with the swallow comes our summer Bayes,
To show his taffeta and lutestring plays;
A choice assortment of slight goods prepares,
The smallest haberdasher of small wares.

In Laputa, we're told, a grave projector,
A mighty schemer—like our new director—
Once form'd a plan—and 'twas a deep one,
Sirs!—

To draw the sun-beams out of cucumbers.
So whilst less vent'rous managers retire,
Our Salamander thinks to live in fire.

A playhouse quidnunc—and no quidnunc's wiser—

Reading our play-bills in the Advertiser, Cries, "Hey! what's here! In th' Hay-market
a play,

To sweat the public in the midst of May?

"Give me fresh air!"—then goes and pouts alone
In country lodgings—by the two-mile stone:
There sits, and chews the cud of his disgust,
Broil'd in the sun, and blinded by the dust.

"Dearee," says Mrs. Inkle, "let us go
"To th' Hay-market to-night and see the show."
"Psha, woman!" cries old Inkle, "you're a
fool:

"We'll walk to Hornsey, and enjoy the cool."
So said, to finish the domestic strife,
Forth waddle the fat spouse, and fatter wife:
And as they tug up Highgate-hill together,
He cries—"Delightful walking!—charming weather!"

Now with the napkin underneath the chin,
Unbutton'd cits their turtle-feasts begin,
And plunge full knuckle-deep, through thick
and thin:

[jelly,
Throw down fish, flesh, fowl, pastry, custard,
And make a salmagundy of their belly.

"More China-pepper! punch, another rummer!"
"So cool and pleasant—eating in the summer!"

To ancient geographers it was not known
Mortals could live beneath the torrid zone:
But we, though toiling underneath the line,
Must make our hay now while the weather's fine.
Your good old hay-maker, long here employ'd,
The sun-shine of your smiles who still enjoy'd;
The fields which long he mow'd will not forsake,
Nor quite forego the sithe, the fork, and rake;
But take the field, even in the hottest day,
And kindly help us to get in our hay.

§ 96. Prologue to the Spanish Barber. 1777.
COLMAN.

ONCE more from Ludgate-hill behold Paul
Prig! [wig!
The same spruce air, you see, same coat, same
A mercer smart and dapper all allow,
As ever at shop-door shot off a bow.
This summer—for I love a little prance—
This summer, gentlefolks, I've been to France,
To mark the fashions—and to learn to dance.
I, and dear Mrs Prig, the first of Graces!
At Calais, in the diligence took places;
Travell'd through Boulogne, Amiens, and Chantilly,
All in a line—as straight as Piccadilly!
To Paris come, their dresses made me stare—
Their fav'rite color is the French queen's hair:
They're all so fine, so shabby, and so gay,
They look like chimney-sweepers on May-day;
Silks of all colors in the rainbow there;
A Joseph's coat appears the common wear.
Of some I brought home patterns; one, to-night,
We mean to show—'tis true, it is but slight:
But then, for summer wear, you know that's right.

A little weaver, whom I long have known,
Has work'd it up, and begs to have it shown—
But pray observe, my friends, 'tis not his own.
I brought it over—nay, if it miscarries, [Paris."
He'll cry, "'Tis none of mine—it came from
But should you like it, he'll soon let you know,
'Twas spun and manufactur'd in Soho.

'T had a great run abroad, which always yields
Work for our Grub-street, and our Spital-fields.
France charms our ladies, naked bards, and
beaux,

Who smuggle thence their learning and their clothes;

Buckles like gridirons, and wigs on springs;
Têtes built like towers, and rumps like ostrich wings.

If this piece please, each summer I'll go over,
And fetch new patterns by the straits of Dover.

§ 97. Prologue to the School for Scandal. 1777.
GARRICK.

A SCHOOL for scandal!—Tell me, I beseech
you,

Needs there a school this modish art to teach you?
No need of lessons now—the knowing think—
We might as well be taught to eat and drink.

Caus'd by a dearth of scandal, should the vapors
Distress our fair-ones, let them read the papers;
Their pow'rful mixtures such disorders hit,
Crave what they will, there's quantum sufficit.

"Lord!" cries my Lady Wormwood (who loves tattle,

And puts much salt and pepper in her prattle)
Just risen at noon, all night at cards when threshing,

"Strong tea and scandal—bless me, how refreshing!

"Give me the papers, Lisp—how bold and free!
[sips.]

"Last night Lord L. [sips] was caught with Lady D.

"For aching heads, what charming sal volatile!
[sips.]

"If Mrs. B. will still continue flirting,
"We hope she'll draw, or we'll undraw, the curtain.—

"Fine satire, poz! in public all abuse it!
"But, by ourselves, [sips.] our praise we can't refuse it. [star.]—

"Now, Lisp, read you—there, at that dash and
"Yes, ma'am—A certain lord had best beware,

"Who lives not twenty miles from Grovesnor-
square;

"For should he Lady W. find willing—
"Wormwood is bitter."—O! that's me—the villain!

"Throw it behind the fire, and never more
"Let that vile paper come within my door."

Thus at our friends we laugh, who feel the dart;
To reach our feelings, we ourselves must smart.

Is our young bard so young, to think that he
Can stop the full spring-tide of calumny?

Knows he the world so little, and its trade?—
Alas! the devil's sooner rais'd than laid.

So strong, so swift, the monster there's no gag-
ging;

Cut Scandal's head off—still the tongue is wagging.

Proud of your smiles, once lavishly bestow'd,
Again our young Don Quixote takes the road;

To show his gratitude, he draws his pen,
And seeks this hydra, Scandal, in its den;

From his fell gripe the frightened fair to save—
Though he should fail, th' attempt must please the brave.

For your applause, all perils he would through,
He'll fight—that's write—a cavaliero true,
Till ev'ry drop of blood—that's ink—is spilt for
you.

§ 98. Epilogue to the same. 1777. *Spoken
by Mrs. Abington, in the Character of Lady Teazel.* COLMAN.

I, who was late so volatile and gay,
Like a trade-wind must now blow all one way;
Bend all my cares, my studies and my vows,
To one old rusty weather-cock—my spouse:
So wills our virtuous bard!—the pie-bald Bayes
Of crying epilogues and laughing plays.

Old bachelors, who marrysmart young wives,
Learn from our play to regulate your lives;
Each bring his dear to town—all faults upon her—

London will prove the very source of honor;
Plung'd fairly in, like a cold bath, it serves,
When principles relax, to brace the nerves.
Such is my case—and yet I must deplore
That the gay dream of dissipation's o'er;
And say, ye fair, was ever lively wife,
Born with a genius for the highest life,
Like me untimely blasted in her bloom,
Like me condemn'd to such a dismal doom?
Save money—when I just knew how to waste it!
Leave London—just as I began to taste it!
Must I then watch the early-crowing cock?
The melancholy ticking of a clock?
In the lone rustic hall for ever bounded,
With dogs, cats, rats, and squalling brats surrounded?

With humble curates can I now retire,
(While good Sir Peter boozes with the squire)
And at backgammon mortify my soul,
That pants for loo, or flutters at a vole? [pire,
Seven's the main—dear sound!—that must ex-
Lost at hot-cockles round a Christmas fire!
The transient hour of fashion too soon spent,
“Farewell the tranquil mind, farewell content!
Farewell the plumed head—the cushion'd tête,
That takes the cushion from his proper seat!
The spirit-stirring drum!—card-drums I mean—
Spadille, odd trick, pam, basto, king, and queen!
And you, ye knockers, that with brazen throat
The welcome visitor's approach denote—
Farewell! all quality of high renown,
Pride, pomp, and circumstance, of glorious town,
Farewell!—your revels I partake no more,
And Lady Teazel's occupation's o'er.”
All this I told our bard—he smil'd, and said
'twas clear

I ought to play deep tragedy next year:
Meanwhile he drew wise morals from his play,
And in these solemn periods stalk'd away:
“Blest were the fair, like you her faults who stopp'd,
And clos'd her follies when the curtain dropp'd!
No more in vice or error to engage,
Or play the fool at large on life's great stage!”

§ 99. Prologue to A Word to the Wise, performed for the Benefit of Mr. Kelly's Family.
1777. JOHNSON.

THIS night presents a play which public rage,
Or right or wrong, once hooted from the stage*.
From zeal or malice now no more we dread,
For English vengeance was not with the dead.
A generous foe regards with pitying eye
The man whom fate has laid where all must lie.
To wit reviving from its author's dust
Be kind, ye judges, or at least be just:
For no renew'd hostilities invade
Th' oblivious grave's inviolable shade.
Let one great payment every claim appease,
And him who cannot hurt allow to please;
To please by scenes unconscious of offence,
By harmless merriment, or useful sense.
Where aught of bright or fair the piece displays,
Approve it only—'tis too late to praise;
If want of skill or want of care appear,
Forbear to hiss—the poet cannot hear:
By all, like him, must praise and blame be found
At best a fleeting gleam, or empty sound.
Yet then shall calm reflections bless the night,
When liberal pity dignified delight;
When pleasure fir'd her torch at virtue's flame,
And mirth was bounty with an humbler name.

§ 100. Prologue to Sir Thomas Overbury. 1777.
SHERIDAN.

Too long the muse, attach'd to regal show,
Denies the scene to tales of humbler woe;
Such as were wont, while yet they charm'd the
ear,
To steal the plaudit of a silent tear;
When Otway gave domestic grief its part,
And Rowe's familiar sorrows touch'd the heart.
A sceptred traitor, lash'd by vengeful fate,
A bleeding hero, or a falling state,
Are themes (though nobly worth the classic song)
Which feebly claim your sighs, nor claim them
long;

Too great for pity, they inspire respect,
Their deeds astonish, rather than affect;
Proving how rare the heart that woe can move,
Which reason tells us we can never prove.

Other the scene, where sadly stand confest
The private pang that rends the sufferer's breast.
When sorrow sits upon a parent's brow,
When fortune mocks the youthful lover's vow,
All feel the tale—for who so mean but knows
What fathers' sorrows are, what lovers' woes?

On kindred ground our bard his fabric built,
And placed a mirror there for private guilt;
Where, fatal union! will appear combin'd
An angel's form and an abandon'd mind;
Honor attempting passion to reprove,
And friendship struggling with unhallow'd love!

Yet view not, critics, with severe regard,
The orphan offspring of an orphan bard,
Doom'd, whilst he wrote, unpitied to sustain
More real mis'ries than his pen could feign!
Ill-fated Savage! at whose birth was giv'n
No parent but the Muse, no friend but Heaven!

* Upon the first representation of this play 1770, it was damned from the violence of party.

Whose youth no brother knew, with social care
To soothe his sufferings, or demand to share;
No wedded partner of his mortal woe,
To win his smile at all that fate could do;
While, at his death, nor friend's nor mother's tear

Fell on the track of his deserted bier!

So pleads the tale * that gives to future times
The son's misfortunes, and the parent's crimes;
There shall his fame (if own'd to-night) survive,
Fix'd by the hand that bids our language live!

§ 101. Prologue to Bonduca. 1778. GARRICK.

To modern Britons let the old appear
This night, to rouse 'em for this anxious year:
To raise that spirit, which of yore, when rais'd,
Made even Romans tremble while they prais'd:
To rouse that spirit, which through every age
Has wak'd the lyre, and warm'd th' historian's
page;

That dauntless spirit, which on Cressy's plain Rush'd from the heart through ev'ry British
vein;

Nerv'd ev'ry arm the numerous host to dare,
Whilst Edward's valor shone the guiding star,
Whose beams dispers'd the darkness of despair:
Whate'er the craft or number of his foes,
Ever from danger Britain's glory rose.

To the mind's eye let the fifth Harry rise,
And in that vision boasting France despise;
Then turn to later deeds your sires have wrought,
When Anna rul'd, and might Marlborough
fought.

Shall Chatham die and be forgot†?—O no!
Warm from its source let grateful sorrow flow;
His matchless ardor fir'd each fear-struck mind,
His genius soar'd when Britons droop'd and pin'd;
Whilst each State Atlas sunk beneath the load,
His heart unshook with patriot virtue glow'd;
Like Hercules, he freed 'em from the weight,
And on his shoulders fix'd the tottering state;
His strength the monsters of the land defied,
To raise his country's glory was his pride,
And for her service, as he liv'd, he died.

O for his powers, those feelings to impart,
Which rous'd to action every drooping heart;
Now, while the angry trumpet sounds alarms,
And all the nation cries, "To arms, to arms!"
Then would his native strength each Briton
know,

And scorn the threats of an invading foe:
Hatching and feeding every civil broil,
France looks with envy on our happy soil;
When mischief's on the wing she cries for
war,

Insults distress, and braves her conqueror.
But Shakspeare sung—and well this land he knew,

O hear his voice! that "nought shall make us rue,
"If England to itself do rest but true."

* Life of Richard Savage, by Dr. Samuel Johnson.

† Lord Chatham died May 11, 1778.

§ 102. Prologue to the Princess of Parma.
1778. CUMBERLAND.

EREDARK November, with his dripping wings,
Shuts out the cheerful face of men and things,
You all can tell how soon the dreary scene
Affects your wives and daughters with the spleen.
Madam begins—"My dear, these odious rains
Will bring on all my old rheumatic pains;
In fifty places it came in last night—
This vile old crazy mansion's such a fright!"

"What's to be done?"—"In very truth, my
love,

I think 'twere better for us to remove."

This said, if as it chance that gentle spouse
Bears but a second int'rest in the house,
The bill is pass'd—no sooner said than done—
Up springs the hen-bird, and the covey's gone:
Then hey for London! there the game begins;
Bouquets, and diamond stars, and golden pins,
A thousand freakish wants, a thousand sighs,
A thousand poutings, and ten thousand lies.
Trim, and new-rigg'd, and launch'd for pleasure's gale,

Our madam comes, her goslings at her tail;
Away they scamper to present their faces
At Johnson's citadel, for side-box places.
He to their joint and supplicating moan
Presents a face of brass, a heart of stone;
Or, monarch-like, while their address is stating,
Sends them a "veto" by his lord in waiting.

Returning thence, the disappointed fleet
Anchors in Tavistock's fantastic street;
There under Folly's colors gaily rides,
Where humor points, or veering passion guides.

In vain the steward racks, and tenants rave:
Money she wants, and money she will have.
Meanwhile, terrific hangs the unpaid bill,
Long as from Portman-square to Ludgate-hill.
The squire, exhausted, in desponding plight
Creeps to his chambers to avoid the sight,
Or at the Mount with some old snarler chimes
In damning wives, and railing at the times.
Such is the scene!—If then we fetch you down
Amusements which endear the smoky town,
And through the peasant's poor but useful hands
We circulate the produce of your lands;

In this voluptuous dissipated age,
Sure there's some merit in our rural stage‡.

Happy the call, nor wholly vain the play,
Which weds you to your acres but a day.

§ 103. Epilogue to Percy. 1778. GARRICK.

I MUST, will speak—I hope my dress and
air

Announce the man of fashion, not the play'r:
Though gentlemen are now forbid the scenes,
Yet I have rush'd through heroes, kings, and queens;

Resolv'd, in pity to this polish'd age,
To drive these ballad-heroes from the stage—

"To drive the deer with hound and horn,
Earl Percy took his way;
The child may rue that is unborn
The hunting of that day."

A pretty basis truly, for a maudlin play!
What! shall a scribbling, senseless woman, dare
To offer to your tastes such tasteless fare?
Is Douglas, or is Percy, fir'd with passion,
Ready, for love or glory, death to dash on,
Fit company for modern still-life men of fashion?
Such madness will our hearts but slightly graze;
We've no such frantic nobles now-a-days.
Could we believe old stories, those strange fellows
Married for love, could of their wives be jealous—
Nay, constant to 'em too—and, what is worse,
The vulgar souls thought cuckoldom a curse!
Most wedded pairs had then one purse, one mind,
One bed too—so preposterously join'd!
From such barbarity (thank Heaven!) we're re-
fin'd.

Old songs at home their happiness record,
From home they sep'rate carriages abhor'd—
One horse serv'd both—my lady rode behind my lord.

[der:
'Twas death alone could snap their bonds asun-
Now tack'd so slightly, not to snap's the wonder.
Nay, death itself could not their hearts divide,
They mix'd their love with monumental pride;
For, cut in stone, they still lay side by side.
But why these Gothic ancestors produce?
Why scour their rusty armours? what's the use?
'Twould not your nicer optics much regale,
To see us beaux bend under coats of mail:
Should we our limbs with iron doublets bruise,
Good Heaven! how much court-plaster we should use!

We wear no armour now—but on our shoes.
Let not with barbarism true taste be blended;
Old vulgar virtues cannot be defended;
Let the dead rest—we living can't be mended.

§ 104. Epilogue to Fatal Falsehood. 1779.

SHERIDAN.

UNHAND me, gentlemen. By Heaven, I say,
I'll make a ghost of him who bars my way.

[Behind the scenes.

Forth let me come—a poetaster true,
As lean as Envy, and as baneful too;
On the dull audience let me vent my rage,
Or drive these female scribblers from the stage.
For sense or history, we've none but these:
The law of liberty and wit they seize;
In tragic—comic—pastoral—they dare to please.
Each puny bard must surely burst with spite,
To find that women with such fame can write:
But O, your partial favor is the cause,
Who feed their follies with such full applause;
Yet still our tribe shall seek to blast their fame,
And ridicule each fair pretender's aim,
Where the dull duties of domestic life
Wage with the muse's toils eternal strife.

What motley cares Corilla's mind perplex,
While maids and metaphors conspire to vex!

In studious dishabille behold her sit,
A letter'd gossip, and a housewife wit;
At once invoking, though for different views,
Her gods, her cook, her milliner, and muse.
Round her strew'd room a frippery chaos lies,
A checquer'd wreck of notable and wise;
Bills, books, caps, couplets, combs, a varied mass,
Oppress the toilet, and obscure the glass;
Unfinish'd here an epigram is laid,
And there a mantua-maker's bill unpaid;
Here new-born plays foretaste the town's applause,

There, dormant patterns lie for future gauze;
A moral essay now is all her care;
A satire next, and then a bill of fare:
A scene she now projects, and now a dish;
Here's act the first—and here—Remove with fish.

Now while this eye in a fine phrensy rolls,
That, soberly casts up a bill for coals;
Black pins and daggers in one leaf she sticks,
And tears, and thread, and bowls, and thimbles mix.

Sappho, 'tis true, long vers'd in epic song,
For years esteem'd all household studies wrong;
When, dire mishap! though neither shame
nor sin,

Sappho herself, and not her muse, lies in.
The virgin Nine in terror fly the bow'r,
And matron Juno claims despotic pow'r:
Soon Gothic hags the classic pile o'erturn,
A caudle-cup supplants the sacred urn;
Nor books nor implements escape their rage,
They spike the ink-stand, and they rend the page:
Poems and plays one barbarous fate partake;
Ovid and Plautus suffer at the stake;
And Aristotle's only sav'd—to wrap plum-cake.

Yet shall a woman tempt the tragic scene?
And dare—but hold—I must repress my spleen:
I see your hearts are pledg'd to her applause,
While Shakspeare's spirit seems to aid her cause,
Well pleas'd to aid—since o'er his sacred bier
A female hand did ample trophies rear,
And gave the gentlest laurel that is worshipp'd
there.

§ 105. Prologue to the Fathers. 1779.

GARRICK.

WHEN from the world departs a son of Fame,
His deeds or works embalm his precious name;
Yet, not content, the public call for art,
To rescue from the tomb his mortal part;
Demand the painter's and the sculptor's hand,
To spread his mimic form throughout the land;
A form, perhaps, which living was neglected,
And, when it could not feel respect, respected.
This night, no bust or picture claims your praise;
Our claim's superior—we his Spirit raise;
From Time's dark store-house bring a long-lost
play,
And drag it from oblivion into day.

But who the author? Need I name the wit
Whom nature prompted as his genius writ?
Truth smil'd on Fancy for each well-wrought story,
Where characters live, act, and stand, before ye.

Suppose these characters, various as they are,
The knave, the fool, the worthy, wise, and fair,
For and against the author pleading at your bar.
First pleads Tom Jones—grateful his heart and warm—

“ Brave gen’rous Britons! shield this play from harm ;

My best friend wrote it ; should it not succeed,
Though with my Sophy blest—my heart will bleed ;”

Then from his face he wipes the manly tear.

“ Courage, my master!” Partridge cries, “ don’t fear :

Should Envy’s serpents hiss, or Malice frown,
Though I’m a coward, zounds ; I’ll knock ’em
down.”

Next, sweet Sophia comes—she cannot speak—
Her wishes for the play o’erspread her cheek ;
In ev’ry look her sentiments you read,
And more than eloquence her blushes plead.
Now Blifil bows—with smiles his false heart
gilding—

“ He was my foe—I’ll beg you’ll damn this Fielding*.”

“ Right!” Thwackum roars, “ no mercy, sirs, I pray ;

Scourge the dead author, through his orphan
play.”

“ What words!” cries Parson Adams ; “ fie, fie ! disown ’em !

Good Lord!—de mortuis nil nisi bonum : [’em?
If such are Christian teachers, who’ll revere
If thus they preach, the devil alone should hear
’em.” [vagrant

Now Slipslop enters—“ Though this scriv’ning
Slated my virtue, which was ever flagrant,
Yet, like black Thello, I’d bear scorns and Slip into poverty to th’ very hips, [whips,
T’ exult this play—may it decrease in favor,
And be its fame immortaliz’d for ever!”

Squire Western, reeling with October mellow, “ Tally-o, boys!—Yoicks!—Critics, hunt the fellow !

Damn ’em! these wits are varmint not worth breeding : [ing?”

What good e’er came of writing and of read-
Next comes, brimfull of spite and politics,
His sister Western—and thus deeply speaks :

“ Wits are arm’d pow’rs ; like France attack
the foe ;

Negotiate till they sleep—then strike the blow.”

Allworthy, last, pleads to your noblest passions:

“ Ye gen’rous leaders of the tastes and fashions,
Departed Genius left his orphan play

To your kind care—what the dead wills, obey :

O then respect the father’s fond bequest,

And make his widow smile, his spirit rest !”

§ 106. Prologue to the Miniature-Picture.
1780. SHERIDAN.

CHILL’D by rude gales, while yet reluctant
May

Withholds the beauties of the vernal day ;

As some fond maid, whom matron-frowns re-
prove,

Suspends the smile her heart devotes to love ;
The season’s pleasures too delay their hour,
And winter revels with protracted pow’r :

Then blame not, critics, if thus late we bring
A winter’s drama ; but reproach—the spring.

What prudent cit dares yet the season trust,
Bask in his whisky, and enjoy the dust ?

Hous’d in Cheapside, scarce yet the gayer spark
Achieves the Sunday triumph of the Park :

Scarce yet you see him, dreading to be late,
Scour the New-road, and dash through Grosvenor-gate.

Anxious—and fearful too—his steed to show,
The hack’d Bucephalus of Rotten-row :

Careless he seems, yet vigilantly sly,
Wooes the stray glance of ladies passing by ;

While his off-heel, insidiously aside,
Provokes the caper which he seems to chide.

Scarce rural Kensington due honor gains :
The vulgar verdure of her walk remains,

Where white-rob’d misses amble two by two,
Nodding to booted beaux—“ How do, how do?”

With gen’ral questions, that no answer wait,
“ How vastly full ? A’n’t you come vastly late ?

Isn’t it quite charming ? When do you leave town ?

An’t you quite tir’d ? Pray, can we set you down ?”

These suburb pleasures of a London May
Imperfect yet, we hail the cold delay :

But if this plea’s denied, in our excuse
Another still remains you can’t refuse ;

It is a lady writes—and hark—a noble muse !
But see a critic starting from his bench—

“ A noble author!” Yes, sir, but the play’s not French ;

Yet if it were, no blame on us could fall ;
For we, you know, must follow fashion’s call :

And true it is, things lately were in train
To woo the Gallic Muse at Drury-lane ;

Not to import a troop of foreign elves,
But treat you with French actors—in ourselves.

A friend we had, who vow’d he’d make us speak
Pure flippant French—by contract—in a week ;

Told us ’twas time to study what was good,
Polish, and leave off being understood :

That crowded audiences we thus might bring
To Monsieur Parsons, and Chevalier King ;

Or should the vulgar grumble now and then,
The prompter might translate—for country gentlemen.

Straight all subscrib’d—kings, gods, mutes,
singer, actor ;

A Flanders figure-dancer our contractor.
But here I grieve to own, though ’t be to you,

He acted—e’en as most contractors do,
Sold what he never dealt in ; and, th’ amount

Being first discharg’d, submitted his account.
And what th’ event ? Their industry was such,

Doddspoke good Flemish, Bannister bad Dutch :
Then the rogue told us, with insulting ease,

So it was foreign, it was sure to please :

* The late Henry Fielding, Esq. author of the play.

§ 109. Prologue to The Birth-Day, Aug. 12,
1783. COLMAN.

WHEN Fate on some tremendous act seems bent,
And Nature labors with the dread event,
Portents and prodigies convulse the earth,
That heaves and struggles with the fatal birth.
In happier hours are lavish blessings given,
And pour'd in floods to mark the hand of Hea-
In a long series of bright glories drest, [ven.
Britons must hail this day supremely blest.
First on this day, in liberty's great cause,
A Brunswick came to guard our rights and laws:
On this great day our glorious annals tell,
By British arms the pride of Cuba fell;
For then, the Moro's gallant chief o'erthrown,
Th' Havannah saw his fate, and felt her own:
The self-same day, the same auspicious morn,
Our elder hope, our Prince, our George was born:

Upon his natal hour what triumphs wait!
What captive treasures crowd the palace-gate!
What double joys the royal parents claim,
Of home-felt happiness and public fame!

Long, very long, great GEORGE! protect the
land,
Thy race, like arrows in a giant's hand! [rose,
For still, though blights may nip some infant
And kill the budding beauty ere it blows,
Indulgent Heaven prolongs th' illustrious line,
Branching like th' olive, clust'ring like the vine.

Long, very long, thy course of glory run,
A bright example to thy royal son!
Forming that son to grace, like thee, the throne,
And make his father's virtues all his own!

§ 110. Prologue to The Election of Managers.
1784. COLMAN.

"CURST be the verse, how well soe'er it flow,
That tends to make one worthy man my foe;
Gives virtue scandal, innocence a fear,
Or from the soft-eyed virgin steals a tear!"

Thus sung sweet Pope, the vigorous child of satire; [nature.
Our Bayes less genius boasts, not less good-
No poison'd shaft he darts with partial aim,
Folly and vice are fair and general game;
No tale he echoes, on no scandal dwells,
Nor plants on one fool's head the cap and bells;
He paints the living manners of the time,
But lays at no man's door reproach or crime.

Yet some, with critic nose, and eye too keen,
Scent double meaning out, and blast each scene:
While squint Suspicion holds her treacherous lamp,
Fear moulds base coin, and Malice gives the stamp.

Falsehood's vile gloss converts the very Bible
To scandalum magnatum, and a libel.

Thus once, when sick, Sir Gripus, as we're told,
In grievous usury grown rich and old,
Bought a good book that, on a Christian plan,
Inculcates the Whole Duty of a Man.

To every sin a sinner's name he tack'd,
And through the parish all the vices track'd:
And thus, the comment and the text enlarging,
Crowds all his friends and neighbours in the margin.

Pride was my lord, and drunkenness the squire;
My lady, vanity and loose desire;
Hardness of heart no misery regarding,
Was overseer—luxury, churchwarden.
All, all he damn'd; and, carrying the farce on,
Made fraud the lawyer, gluttony the parson.

'Tis said, when winds the troubled deep de-
form,
Pour copious streams of oil, 'twill lay the storm:
Thus here, let mirth and frank good-humor's balm

Make censure mild, scorn kind, and anger calm!
Some wholesome bitter if the bard produces,
'Tis only wormwood to correct the juices.

In this day's contest, where, in colors new,
Three play-house candidates are brought to view,
Our little Bayes encounters some disgrace:
Should you reject him too, I mourn his case—
He can be chosen for no other place.

§ 111. Prologue to Mahomet.

To point what lengths credulity has run,
What counsels shaken, and what states undone;
What hellish fury wings th' enthusiast's rage,
And makes the troubled earth one tragic stage;
What blasphemies imposture dares advance,
And build what terrors on weak ignorance;
How fraud alone rage to religion binds,
And makes a pandæmonium of our minds.
Our Gallic bard, fired with these glorious views,
First to this crusade led the tragic muse;
Her pow'r through France his charming numbers bore, [sore.

But France was deaf—for all her priests were
On English ground she makes a firmer stand,
And hopes to suffer by no hostile hand.

No clergy here usurp the free-born mind,
Ordain'd to teach, and not enslave mankind;
Religion here bids persecution cease,
Without, all order, and within, all peace;
Truth guards her happy pale with watchful care,
And frauds, though pious, find no entrance
Religion, to be sacred, must be free; [there.
Men will suspect—where bigots keep the key.
Hooded and train'd like hawks th' enthusiasts fly,
And the priests' victims in their pounces die.
Like whelps born blind, by mother-church
they're bred,

Nor wake to sight, to know themselves misled:
Murder's the game—and to the sport unprest,
Proud of the sin, and in the duty blest,
The layman's but the blood-hound of the priest.
Whoe'er thou art, that dar'st such themes advance,

To priest-rid Spain repair, or slavish France:
For Judas' hire there do the devil's task,
And trick up slavery in religion's mask.
England, still free, no surer means requires
To sink their sottish souls, and damp their martial fires.

Britons, these numbers to yourselves you owe;
Voltaire hath strength to shoot in Shakspeare's
bow:

Fame led him at his Hippocrene to drink,
And taught to write with nature, as to think:
With English freedom, English wit he knew,
And from the unexhausted stream profusely
drew:

Cherish the noble bard yourselves have made,
Nor let the frauds of France steal all our trade:
Now of each prize the winner has the wearing,
E'en send our English stage a-privateering:
With your commission we'll our sails unfold,
And from their loads of dross import some gold.

§ 112. Prologue to the Jealous Wife.

LLOYD.

THE Jealous Wife a comedy, poor man!
A charming subject, but a wretched plan.
His skittish wit, o'erleaping the due bound,
Commits flat trespass upon tragic ground.
Quarrels, upbraidings, jealousies, and spleen,
Grow too familiar in the comic scene.
Tinge but the language with heroic chime,
'Tis passion, pathos, character, sublime!
What round big words had swell'd the pompous scene,
A king the husband, and the wife a queen!
Then might Distraction rend her graceful hair, See sightless forms, and scream, and gape, and stare.

Drawcansir Death had rag'd without control,
Here the drawn dagger, there the poison'd bowl.
What eyes had stream'd at all the whining woe!
What hands had thunder'd at each Ah! and Oh!

But peace! the gentle prologue custom sends,
Like drum and serjeant, to beat up for friends.
At vice and folly, each a lawful game,
Our author flies, but with no partial aim.
He read the manners, open as they lie
In nature's volume to the gen'ral eye. [store—
Books too he read, nor blush'd to use their
He does but what his betters did before.
Shakspeare has done it, and the Grecian stage
Caught truth of character from Homer's page.

If in his scenes an honest skill is shown,
And, borrowing little, much appears his own;
If what a master's happy pencil drew
He brings more forward in dramatic view;
To your decision he submits his cause,
Secure of candour, anxious for applause.

But if, all rude, his artless scenes deface
The simple beauties which he meant to grace;
If, an invader upon others' land,
He spoil and plunder with a robber's hand;
Do justice on him—as on fools before—
And give to blockheads past one blockhead more.

§ 113. Prologue to Runnamede.

BEFORE the records of renown were kept,
Or theatres for dying heroes wept,
The race of fame by rival chiefs was run,
The world by former Alexanders won;
Ages of glory in long order roll'd,
New empires rising on the wreck of old:

Wonders were wrought by Nature in her prime,
Nor was the ancient world a wilderness of time.

Yet lost to fame is virtue's orient reign;
The patriot liv'd, the hero died, in vain.
Dark night descended o'er the human day,
And wip'd the glory of the world away:
Whirl'd round the gulf, the acts of time were tost,

Then in the vast abyss for ever lost.

Virtue from Fame disjoin'd began to 'plain
Her votaries few, and unfrequented fane.
Her voice ascended to almighty Jove;
He sent the Muses from the throne above.

The bard arose; and full of heavenly fire,
With hand immortal touch'd th' immortal lyre;
Heroic deeds in strains heroic sung,
All earth resounded, all heaven's arches rung:
The world applaud what they approv'd before,
Virtue and Fame took sep'rate paths no more.

Hence to the bard, interpreter of heaven,
The chronicle of fame by Jove is given;
His eye the volume of the past explores,
His hand unfolds the everlasting doors;
In Minos' majesty he lifts the head,
Judge of the world, and sov'reign of the dead;
On nations and on kings in sentence sits,
Dooms to perdition, or to heaven admits;
Dethrones the tyrant though in triumph hurl'd,
Calls up the hero from th' eternal world,
Surrounds his head with wreaths that ever bloom,

And vows the verse that triumphs o'er the tomb.

While here the Muses warble from the shrine,
Oft have you listen'd to the voice divine.
A nameless youth beheld, with noble rage,
One subject still a stranger to the stage;
A name that's music to the British ear,
A name that's worshipp'd in the British sphere:
Fair Liberty! the goddess of the isle,
Who blesses England with a guardian smile.

Britons! a scene of glory draws to-night!
The fathers of the land arise to sight;
The legislators and the chiefs of old,
The roll of patriots and the barons bold,
Who, greatly girded with the sword and shield,
At storied Runnamede's immortal field,
Did the grand charter of your freedom draw,
And found the base of liberty on law.

Our author, trembling for his virgin muse,
Hopes in the fav'rite theme a fond excuse.
If, while the tale the theatre commands,
Your hearts applaud him, he'll acquit your
hands;

Proud on his country's cause to build his name,
And add the patriot's to the poet's fame.

§ 114. Prologue to the Heiress.

FITZPATRICK.

As sprightly sun-beams gild the face of day,
When low'ring tempests calmly glide away,
So, when the poet's dark horizon clears,
Array'd in smiles the Epilogue appears.
She of that house the lively emblem still,
Whose brilliant speakers start what themes they
will;

Still varying topics for her sportive rhymes,
From all the follies of these fruitful times ;
Uncheck'd by forms, with flippant hand may cull :—

Prologues, like peers, by privilege are dull—
In solemn strain address th' assembled pit,
The legal judges of dramatic wit,
Confining still, with dignified decorum,
Their observations—to the play before 'em.

Now when each bachelor a helpmate lacks,
(That sweet exemption from a double tax)
When laws are fram'd with a benignant plan
Of light'ning burdens on the married man,
And Hymen adds one solid comfort more
To all those comforts he conferr'd before ;
To smooth the rough laborious road to fame,
Our bard has chosen—an alluring name.
As wealth in wedlock oft is known to hide
The imperfections of a homely bride,
This tempting title he, perhaps, expects,
May heighten beauties—and conceal defects :
Thus Sixty's wrinkles, view'd through Fortune's glass,

The rosy dimples of Sixteen surpass.
The modern suitor grasps his fair-one's hand,
O'erlooks her person, and adores—her land ;
Leers on her houses with an ogling eye,
O'er her rich acres heaves an am'rous sigh,
His heart-felt pangs through groves of—timber
vents,

And runs distracted for—her three per cents.

Will thus the poet's mimic Heiress find
The bridegroom critic to her failings blind,
Who claims, alas ! his nicer taste to hit,
The lady's portion paid in sterling wit ?
On your decrees, to fix her future fate,
Depends our Heiress for her whole estate :
Rich in your smiles, she charms th' admiring
town ;

A very bankrupt, should you chance to frown :
O may a verdict given, in your applause,
Pronounce the prosp'rous issue of her cause,
Confirm the name an anxious parent gave her,
And prove her Heiress of the public favour !

§ 115. Prologue to The Ambitious Step-mother.
ROWE.

IF dying lovers yet deserve a tear ;
If a sad story of a maid's despair
Yet move compassion in the pitying fair ;
This day the poet does his arts employ,
The soft accesses of your souls to try.
Nor let the stoic boast his mind unmov'd ;
The brute philosopher, who ne'er has prov'd
The joy of loving and of being lov'd ;
Who scorns his human nature to confess,
And, striving to be more than man, is less.
Nor let the men the weeping fair accuse,
Those kind protectors of the tragic muse,
Whose tears did moving Otway's labours crown,
And made the poor Monimia's grief their own :
Those tears their art, not weakness, has confest,
Their grief approv'd the niceness of their taste,
And they wept most, because they judg'd the best.

O ! could this age's writers hope to find
An audience to compassion thus inclin'd,
The stage would need no farce, nor song, nor dance, [France ;

Nor cap'ring Monsieur brought from active
Clinch, and his organ-pipe, his dogs and bear,
To native Barnet might again repair,
Or breathe, with Captain Otter, Bankside air :
Majestic Tragedy should once again
In purple pomp adorn the swelling scene ;
Her search should ransack all the ancient store,
The fortunes of their loves and arms explore,
Such as might grieve you, but should please the
more.

What Shakspeare durst not, this bold age should do,

And famous Greek and Latin beauties show :
Shakspeare, whose genius, to itself a law,
Could men in ev'ry height of nature draw,
And copied all but woman that he saw.

Those ancient heroines your concern should
move,

Their grief and anger much, but most their
love :

For in th' account of ev'ry age we find
The best and fairest of that sex were kind,
To pity always, and to love, inclin'd.
Assert, ye fair ones, who in judgment sit,
Your ancient empire over love and wit ;
Reform your sense, and teach the men t' obey :
They'll leave their tumbling, if you lead the
way.

Be but what those before to Otway were :
O were you but as kind ! we know you are as fair.

§ 116. Epilogue to the same. ROWE.

THE spleen and vapours, and this doleful play,
Have mortified me to that height to-day,
That I am almost in the mortal mind
To die indeed and leave you all behind.
Know then, since I resolve in peace to part,
I mean to leave to one alone my heart :
(Last favours will admit of no partage,
I bar all sharing but upon the stage :)
To one who can with one alone be blest,
The peaceful monarch of a single breast :
To one—But, oh ! how hard 'twill be to find
That phoenix in your fickle, changing kind !
New loves, new interests, and religions new,
Still your fantastic appetites pursue.
Your sickly fancies loathe what you possess,
And ev'ry restless fool would change his place.
Some, weary of their peace and quiet grown,
Want to be hoisted up aloft, and shown ;
Whilst from the envied height the wise get safely down.

We find your wav'ring temper to our cost,
Since all our pains and care to please is lost.
Music in vain supports with friendly aid
Her sister Poetry's declining head :
Show but a mimic ape, or French buffoon,
You to the other house in shoals are gone,
And leave us here to tune our crouds alone.
Must Shakspeare, Fletcher, and laborious Ben,
Be left for Scaramouch and Harlequin ?

Allow you are inconstant, yet 'tis strange,
 For sense is still the same, and ne'er can change;
 Yet even in that you vary as the rest,
 And ev'ry day new notions are profest.
 Nay, there's a wit * has found, as I am told,
 New ways to heaven, despairing of the old:
 He swears he'll spoil the clerk and sexton's trade,
 Bells shall no more be rung, nor graves be made:
 The hearse and six no longer be in fashion,
 Since all the faithful may expect translation.
 What think you of the project? I'm for trying;
 I'll lay aside these foolish thoughts of dying,
 Preserve my youth and vigour for the stage,
 And be translated to a good old age.

§ 117. Prologue to The Tender Husband, or the Accomplished Fools. ADDISON.

IN the first rise and infancy of farce,
 When fools were many, and when plays were scarce,

The raw unpractis'd author could with ease
 A young and inexperienc'd audience please;
 No single character had e'er been shown,
 But the whole herd of fops were all their own:
 Rich in originals, they set to view,
 In ev'ry piece, a cockcomb that was new.

But now our British theatre can boast
 Drolls of all kinds, a vast unthinking host!
 Fruitful of folly and of vice, it shows [beaux;
 Cuckolds, and cits, and bawds, and pimps, and Rough country-knights are found of ev'ry shire,
 Of every fashion gentle fops appear;
 And punks of different characters we meet,
 As frequent on the stage as in the street:
 Our modern wits are forc'd to pick and cull,
 And here and there, by chance, glean up a fool:
 Long ere they find the necessary spark,
 They search the town and beat about the Park:
 To all his most frequented haunts resort,
 Oft dog him to the ring, and oft to court,
 As love of pleasure or of place invites; [White's.
 And sometimes catch him taking snuff at

Howe'er, to do you right, the present age
 Breeds very hopeful monsters for the stage;
 That scorn the paths their dull forefathers trod,
 And won't be blockheads in the common road.
 Do but survey this crowded house to-night:
 —Here's still encouragement for those that write.

Our author, to divert his friends to-day,
 Stocks with variety of fools his play;
 And, that there may be something gay and new,
 Two ladies-errant has expos'd to view:
 The first a damsel travell'd in romance;
 The other more refin'd, she comes from France.
 Rescue, like courteous knights, the nymph from danger; [stranger.
 And kindly treat, like well-bred men, the § 118. Epilogue to the same. STEELE.

BRITONS, who constant war, with factious
 For liberty, against each other wage, [rage,
 From foreign insults save this English stage.

* Asgill.

No more th' Italian squalling tribe admit,
 In tongues unknown; 'tis popery in wit.
 The songs (themselves confess) from Rome
     they bring,
 And 'tis high-mass, for aught you know, they sing.

Husbands, take care, the danger may come nigher,

The women say their eunuch is a friar.

But is it not a serious ill to see
 Europe's great arbiters so mean can be;
 Passive, with an affected joy to sit,
 Suspend their native taste of manly wit;
 Neglect their comic humour, tragic rage,
 For known defects of nature and of age?
 Arise! for shame! ye conqu'ring Britons, rise!

Such unadorn'd effeminacy despise;
 Admire (if you will dote on foreign wit)
 Not what Italians sing, but Romans writ.
 So shall less works, such as to-night's slight play,
 At your command, with justice die away;
 Till then forgive your writers, that can't bear
 You should such very tramontanes appear,
 The nations, which condemn you, to revere.

Let Anna's soul be known for all its charms;
 As fam'd for lib'ral sciences as arms:
 Let those derision meet, who would advance
 Manners, or speech, from Italy or France.
 Let them learn you, who would your favour
     find,

And English be the language of mankind.

§ 119. Epilogue to the Gamester.

CENTLIVRE.

As one condemn'd, and ready to become,
 For his offences past, a pendulum,
 Does, ere he dies, bespeak the learned throng,
 Then, like the swan, expires in a song;
 So I (tho' doubtful long which knot to choose,
 Whether the hangman's, or the marriage noose),
 Condemn'd, good people, as you see, for life,
 To play that tedious, juggling game, a wife,
 Have but one word of good advice to say,
 Before the doleful cart draws quite away.

You roaring boys, who know the midnight
     cares
 Of rattling tats, ye sons of hopes and fears;
 Who labour hard to bring your ruin on,
 And diligently toil to be undone;
 You're fortune's sporting footballs at the best,
 Few are his joys, and small the gamester's rest:
 Suppose then fortune only rules the dice,
 And on the square you play; yet who, that's
     wise,

Would to the credit of a faithless main
 Trust his good dad's hard-gotten hoarded gain?
 But then such vultures round a table wait,
 And hov'ring watch the bubble's sickly state;
 The young fond gambler, covetous of more,
 Like Æsop's dog, loses his certain store;
 Then the sponge, squeez'd by all, grows dry—
     and now,

Completely wretched, turns a sharper too.
 These fools, for want of bubbles, too, play fair,
 And lose to one another on the square:

So whores the wealth from numerous culls
 they glean,
 Still spend on bullies, and grow poor again.
 This itch for play has likewise fatal been,
 And more than Cupid drawn the ladies in :
 A thousand guineas for basset prevails,
 A bait, when cash runs low, that seldom fails ;
 And when the fair-one can't the debt defray
 In sterling coin, does sterling beauty pay.

In vain we labour to divert your care,
 Nor song nor dance can bribe your presence
 here,

You fly this place like an infectious air ;
 To yonder happy quarter of the town
 You crowd, and your own fav'rite stage disown ;
 We're like old mistresses ; you love the vice,
 And hate us only 'cause we once did please.
 Nor can we find how else 'tis we deserve,
 Like Tantalus, 'midst plenty thus to starve.

§ 120. Prologue to Tancred and Sigismunda.
 THOMSON.

BOLD is the man, who in this nicer age
 Presumes to tread the chaste, corrected stage.
 Now, with gay tinsel arts we can no more
 Conceal the want of nature's sterling ore :
 Our spells are vanish'd, broke our magic wand,
 That us'd to waft you over sea and land :
 Before your light the fairy people fade ;
 The demons fly—the ghost itself is laid.
 In vain of martial scenes the loud alarms ;
 The mighty Prompter thund'ring out to arms,
 The playhouse posse clattering from afar,
 The close-wedg'd battle, and the din of war,
 Now e'en the Senate seldom we convene ;
 The yawning fathers nod behind the scene.
 Your taste rejects the glitt'ring false sublime,
 To sigh in metaphor, and die in rhyme.
 High rant is tumbled from his gallery throne :
 Description, dreams—nay, similes are gone.

What shall we then ? to please you how devise,
 Whose judgment sits not in your ears and eyes ?
 Thrice happy could we catch great Shak-speare's art,

To trace the deep recesses of the heart ;
 His simple, plain sublime, to which is given
 To strike the soul with darted flame from heaven ;
 Could we awake soft Otway's tender woe ;
 The pomp of verse, and golden lines of Rowe !

We to your hearts apply ; let them attend :
 Before their silent, candid bar we bend.
 If warm'd they listen, 'tis our noblest praise :
 If cold, they wither all the muse's bays.

§ 121. Epilogue to the same. THOMSON.

CRAMM'D to the throat with wholesome
 moral stuff ;
 Alas ! poor audience ! you have had enough.
 Was ever hapless heroine of a play
 In such a piteous plight as ours to-day ?
 Was ever woman so by love betray'd ?
 Match'd with two husbands, and yet—die a maid !

But, bless me !—hold—what sounds are these
 I hear ?—

I see the Tragic Muse herself appear !

[The black scene opens, and discovers a romantic sylvan landscape, from which Sigismunda, in the character of the Tragic Muse, advances slowly to music, and speaks the following lines :

Hence with your flippant epilogue, that tries
 To wipe the virtuous tears from British eyes ;
 That dares my moral, tragic scene profane,
 With strains—at best, unsuited, light, and vain.
 Hence from the pure, unsullied beams, that play

In yon fair eyes, where virtue shines—Away !

Britons, to you, from chaste Castalian groves,
 Where dwelt the tender, oft unhappy loves ;
 Where shades of heroes roam, each mighty
 name,

And court my aid, to rise again to fame :

To you I come ; to freedom's noblest seat ;

And in Britannia fix my last retreat.

In Greece, and Rome, I watch'd the public
 weal ;

The purple tyrant trembled at my steel ;
 Nor did I less o'er private sorrows reign,
 And mend the melting heart with softer pain.
 On France and you then rose my bright'ning star
 With social ray—The arts are ne'er at war.
 O ! as your fire and genius stronger blaze ;
 As yours are gen'rous freedom's bolder lays ;
 Let not the Gallic taste leave yours behind,
 In decent manners and in life refin'd ;
 Banish the motley mode, to tag low verse,
 The laughing ballad, to the mournful hearse.
 When through five acts your hearts have learnt to glow,

Touch'd with the sacred force of honest woe,
 O keep the dear impression on your breast,
 Nor idly lose it for a wretched jest !

§ 122. Epilogue to Zara. AARON HILL.

HERE, take a surfeit, sirs, of being jealous,
 And shun the pains that plague those Turkish fellows :

Where love and death joined hands, their darts confounding !

Save us, good heaven ! from this new way of wounding !

Curs'd climate !—where to cards a lone-left woman

Has only one of her black guards to summon !
 Sighs, and sits mop'd, with her tame beast to gaze at :

And that cold treat is all the game she plays at !
 For—should she once some abler hand be try-
 ing,

Poignard's the word ! and the first deal is—dying !

'Slife ! should the bloody whim get round
 in Britain,

Where women's freedom has such heights to sit on ;

Daggers, provok'd, would bring on desolation,
 And murder'd belles unpeople half the nation !

Fain would I hope this play to move compassion—
And live to hunt suspicion out of fashion.—
Four motives strongly recommend, to lovers,
Hate of this weakness, that our scene discovers.

First then—A woman will or won't—depend on't: [on't.
If she will do't, she will—and there's an end
But, if she won't—since safe and sound your trust is,
Fear is affront, and jealousy injustice.

Next, He who bids his dear do what she pleases,
Blunts wedlock's edge, and all its torture eases.
For—not to feel your suff'rings, is the same
As not to suffer—All the difference—name.

Thirdly—The jealous husband wrongs his honor;
No wife goes lame, without some hurt upon her:
And the malicious world will still be guessing,
Who oft dines out dislikes her own cook's dressing.

Fourthly, and lastly—to conclude my lecture,
If you would fix th' inconstant wife—respect her.

She who perceives her virtues over-rated,
Will fear to have th' account more justly stated:
And, borrowing from her pride the good wife's seeming,
Grow really such—to merit your esteeming.

§ 123. Prologue to Mr. Andrews' Comedy of Better Late than Never. DUKE OF LEEDS.

CUSTOM commands a prologue to each play,
But custom hath not told us what to say:
No form prescrib'd, 'tis difficult to find
How to conciliate the public mind.
The bashful bard—the modest muse's fears,
So long have jingled in your patient ears,
That now, perhaps, you'll scarce vouchsafe to
To hear both their apology—and play. [stay
No: better sure on him at once to call, [all?
With—"Sir, if frighten'd thus why write at
We're not reduc'd yet to a trembling pen—
Zounds! bards will crowd us soon, like—gentlemen."

Something like this, I heard a friend once say,
Who wish'd, poor soul, to hear a new-launch'd play:

Box'd snug at first, completely to his mind,
With only one grave auditor behind;
Ere the third act had struggled to its end,
In reel'd three critics, each the author's friend—
On praise determin'd—wit confirm'd by wine:
Each And and If was chaste—correct—damn'd fine! [way;

To taste so mark'd my friend of course gave
But squeez'd, thump'd, kick'd—still listen'd to the play;

Till, by repeated plaudits grown so sore,
Nor flesh nor blood could bear one comment more.

Such boist'rous friends they surely cannot need,
Who wish by merit only to succeed.

To-night we offer to the public view

A character you'll own, perhaps, is new:

From Doctors' Commons we the model draw,
A promising eleve of civil law;
And civil sure that law which can provide,
Or, should need be, release you from, a bride.
Thrice bless'd the mansion, where, in spite of ills,

Alive or dead, you still can have your wills.
Much could I offer in our author's cause,
Nay, prove his first great object—your applause; [wrong,
But, lest dull friendship should his genius
I'll stop—before the prologue grows too long,
And, Better Late than Never, hold my tongue.

§ 124. Epilogue to the same. ANDREWS.

THE drama done, and all its int'rest over,
Content the husband, and secure the lover,
Our timid bard, who dreads the critic ire,
And thinks my little tongue can never tire,
Would have me re-assume the wig and gown,
To plead his goose-quill cause before the town.
"Lord, Sir," says I, "some better counsel
For females in a wig are not the thing. [bring,
Your bearded barrister, if smartly made, is
A surer advocate among the ladies."
"Madam," he cried, "or periwigg'd or bare,
So you but talk, I never need despair."

Suppose, ye fair, as I'm so smooth a prater,
I take a line so consonant to nature;
Give up the vain attempt your hearts to warm,
And 'gainst the men with female weapon arm.

Oft have the wits, unmindful whom they vex,
Expos'd the foibles of the softer sex,
Laugh'd at their dress, their well-shap'd cork,
their feathers,

Their steady bloom, unchanging in all weathers; [brown,
Swore locks were grey, that seem'd a comely
And, though all paid for, deem'd them not their own.

Why not retort, avenge th' insulted fair,
And show these men what wondrous things they are?

Now don't be frighten'd—poor eccentric elves!
I only show what most you like—yourselves.

How! tremble at a woman? shame betide!
Though I look fierce, like you—I'm all outside;
Yet ere my efforts your attention call
To that dear portrait which should hit you all,
Let me delineate what was once a beau,
The Band-box Billy of some years ago.

Sweet image of mamma in every feature,
The youth came forth a most delicious creature,
With full-dress'd skirts, not quite unlike a hoop,
Hat under arm, fine button, and gilt loop—
Stiff stock, long sword still dangling in the way,
He sometimes ventur'd to a first-night play:
Tripp'd through the lobby, most completely curl'd;

Nor did a paw-paw thing for all the world!
Thus he discours'd: "Sir Dilberry, ods so,
Dear, dear, good lack! have you a place below?
Dem it, don't crowd so, fellow!—O, how shocking! [ing."

He's spoil'd my hair, and dirtied all my stock.

Such was the smart our grandmamas would
praise,
Rather unlike the smart of present days:
For I defy all history to show
One thing in nature like a modern beau;
Hat slouch'd, short stick, knee-trappings that bring back

The memory of renown'd Sixteen-String Jack;
Eternal boots, and collar you'd suppose
Cut in kind contact with his buckship's nose.
Thus trimly deck'd, each night among the doxies

He storms the lobby, and assails the boxes;
With gait and manner—something in this way,
Proves his rare taste, and descants on the play—
“Here, box-keeper! why don't the rascal come?
Halloo—Tom Gerkin! can you give us room?
What's this?—The farce—Macbeth—

an opera?—O! [low!

Came out last season—stupid stuff—damn'd Zounds, let's be off!”—“Zounds, be a little calmer!” [—R. Palmer.”

“Who's that—the Jordan?”—“No, you fool,
Thus some are found, by ev'ry act revealing
Perfect indifference to sense and feeling.

To such our play not sues—but you, ye fair,
Ye wise, whom nature form'd with happier
care, [rent,

Whose tender bosoms, though by passions
Feel the soft virtues in their full extent,
Cherish our author's plan, which aims to prove
Life's best exertions spring from virtuous love.

§ 125. Verses written to be spoken by Mrs. Siddons, at her Benefit, April 27, 1795.

ROGERS.

Yes, 'tis the pulse of life! my fears were vain!
I wake, I breathe, and am myself again,
Still in this nether world! no seraph yet—
Nor walks my spirit when the sun is set,
With troubled step to haunt the fatal board
Where I died last—by poison or the sword;
And blanch each honest cheek with deeds of
night,

Done here so oft by dim and doubtful light.

To drop all metaphor, that little bell
Call'd back reality, and broke the spell.
No heroine claims your tears with tragic tone;
A very woman—scarce restrains her own!
Can she, with fiction, charm the cheated mind,
When to be grateful is the part assign'd?
Ah, no! she scorns the trappings of her art;
No theme but truth, no prompter but the heart.

But, ladies, say, must I alone unmask?
Is here no other actress, let me ask?
Believe me, those, who best the heart dissect,
Know, every woman studies stage-effect:
She moulds her manners to the part she fills,
As instinct teaches, or as humor wills;
And, as the grave or gay her talent calls,
Acts in the drama, till the curtain falls.

First, how her little breast with triumph
swells,

When the red coral rings its silver bells!
To play in pantomime is then the rage
Along the carpet's many-color'd stage;

Or lisp her merry thoughts with loud endeavour, ever!

Now here, now there—in noise and mischief
A school-girl next, she curls her hair in papers,
And mimics father's gout, and mother's vapors;
Discards her doll, bribes Betty for romances,
Playful at church, and serious when she dances;
Tramples alike on customs and on toes,
And whispers all she hears to all she knows;
Terror of caps and wigs and sober notions!
A romp! that longest of perpetual motions!
—Till, tam'd and tortur'd into foreign graces,
She sports her lovely face at public places;
And, with blue laughing eyes, behind her fan,
First acts her part with that great actor, man.

Too soon a flirt—approach her and she flies;
Frowns when pursued, and when entreated sighs;
Plays with unhappy men as cats with mice,
Till fading beauty hints the late advice.

Her prudence dictates what her pride disdain'd,
And now she sues to slaves herself had chain'd.

Then comes that good old character, a wife,
With all the dear distracting cares of life;
A thousand cards a-day at doors to leave,
And, in return, a thousand cards receive;
Rouge high, play deep, to lead the ton aspire,
With nightly blaze set Portland-place on fire;
Snatch half a glimpse at concert, opera, ball,
A meteor trac'd by none, though seen by all;
And when her shatter'd nerves forbid to roam,
In very spleen—rehearse the girl at home.

Last the grey dowager in ancient flounces,
With snuff and spectacles the age denounces;
Boasts how the sires of this degenerate isle
Knelt for a look, and duell'd for a smile;
The scourge and ridicule of Goth and Vandal,
Her tea she sweetens, as she sips, with scandal;
With modern belles eternal warfare wages,
Like her own birds that clamor from their cages;
And shuffles round to bear her tale to all,
Like some old ruin “nodding to its fall.”

Thus woman makes her entrance and her exit,
Then most an actress when she least suspects it.
Yet nature oft peeps out and mars the plot,
Each lesson lost, each poor pretence forgot;
Full oft with energy that scorns control,
At once lights up the features of the soul;
Unlocks each thought chain'd down by coward
And to full day the latent passions start. [art,

But she, whose first best wish is your applause,
Herself exemplifies the truth she draws.
Born on the stage, through ev'ry shifting scene,
Obscure or bright, tempestuous or serene,
Still has your smile her trembling spirit fir'd;
And can she act, with thoughts like these in-spir'd?

Thus from her mind all artifice she flings,
All skill, all practice, now unmeaning things!
To you uncheck'd, each genuine feeling flows,
For, all that life endears—to you she owes.

§ 126. *Verses to the Memory of Mr. Garrick.
Spoken as a Monody by Mrs. Yates, at the Theatre Royal in Drury-lane. SHERIDAN.*

If dying excellence deserves a tear,
If fond remembrance still is cherish'd here,

Can we persist to bid our sorrows flow
For fabled suff'ers and delusive woe; [strain,
Or with quaint smiles dismiss the plaintive
Point the quick jest—indulge the comic vein—
Ere yet to buried Roscius we assign
One kind regret, one tributary line?

His fame requires we act a tend'rer part:
His memory claims the tear you gave his art.

The gen'ral voice, the meed of mournful verse,
The splendid sorrows that adorn'd his hearse,
The throng that mourn'd as their dead fav'rite
pass'd,

The grac'd respect that claim'd him to the last;
While Shakspeare's image, from its hallow'd
base,

Seem'd to prescribe the grave, and point the
Nor these, nor all the sad regrets that flow
From fond fidelity's domestic woe, [due,
So much are Garrick's praise—so much his
As on this spot—one tear bestow'd by you.

Amid the arts which seek ingenuous fame,
Our toil attempts the most precarious claim;
To him, whose mimic pencil wins the prize,
Obedient fame immortal wreaths supplies:
Whate'er of wonder Reynolds now may raise,
Raphael still boasts contemporary praise:
Each dazzling light and gaudier bloom subdued,
With undiminish'd awe his works are view'd:
E'en beauty's portrait wears a softer prime,
Touch'd by the tender hand of mellowing time.

The patient sculptor owns an humbler part,
A ruder toil, and more mechanic art;
Content with slow and timorous stroke to trace
The ling'ring line, and mould the tardy grace:
But once achiev'd, though barb'rous wreck o'er-
The sacred fane, and lay its glories low, [throw
Yet shall the sculptur'd ruin rise to-day,
Grac'd by defect, and worshipp'd in decay;
Th' enduring record bears the artist's name,
Demands his honors, and asserts his fame.

Superior hopes the poet's bosom fire,
O proud distinction of the sacred lyre!
Wide as th' inspiring Phœbus darts his ray,
Diffusive splendor gilds his votary's lay.
Whether the song heroic woes rehearse
With epic grandeur, and the pomp of verse;
Or, fondly gay, with unambitious guile
Attempt no prize but fav'ring beauty's smile;
Or bear dejected to the lonely grove
The soft despair of unprevailing love; [clime
Whate'er the theme, through ev'ry age and Congenial passions meet the according rhyme,
The pride of glory, pity's sigh sincere,
Youth's earliest blush, and beauty's virgin tear.

Such is their meed—their honors thus secure,
Whose arts yield objects, and whose works endure:

The actor only shrinks from time's award;
Feeble tradition is his memory's guard;

By whose faint breath his merits must abide,
Unvouch'd by proof, to substance unallied!
E'en matchless Garrick's art, to heaven resign'd,
No fix'd effect, no model, leaves behind.

The grace of action, the adapted mien,
Faithful as nature to the varied scene; [draws
Th' expressive glance, whose subtle comment
Entranc'd attention, and a mute applause;
Gesture that marks, with force and feeling fraught,

A sense in silence, and a will in thought;
Harmonious speech, whose pure and liquid tone
Gives verse a music scarce confess'd its own,
As light from gems assumes a brighter ray,
And, cloth'd with orient hues, transcends the day; [sense,

Passion's wild break, and frowns that awe the
And ev'ry charm of gentle eloquence,
All perishable!—like th' electric fire,
But strike the frame, and, as they strike, expire;
Incense too pure a bodied flame to bear, [air.
Its fragrance charms the sense, and blends with

Where then, while sunk in cold decay he
And pale eclipse for ever veils those eyes, [lies,
Where is the blest memorial that ensures
Our Garrick's fame?—whose is the trust?—
'tis yours.

And, O! by ev'ry charm his art essay'd
To soothe your cares! by ev'ry grief allay'd!
By the hush'd wonder which his accents drew!
By his last parting tear, repaid by you! [night,
By all those thoughts, which, many a distant
Shall mark his memory with a sad delight!
Still in your hearts' dear record bear his name,
Cherish the keen regret that lifts his fame;
To you it is bequeath'd, assert the trust,
And to his worth—'tis all you can—be just.

What more is due from sanctifying time,
To cheerful wit, and many a favor'd rhyme,
O'er his grac'd urn shall bloom, a deathless wreath, [beneath.

Whose blossom'd sweets shall deck the mask
For these when sculpture's votive toil shall rear
The due memorial of a loss so dear,
O loveliest mourner, gentle muse! be thine
The pleasing woe, to guard the laurell'd shrine.
As Fancy oft by Superstition led
To roam the mansions of the sainted dead,
Has view'd, by shadowy eve's unfaithful gloom,
A weeping cherub on a martyr's tomb,
So thou, sweet Muse, hang o'er his sculptur'd bier,

With patient woe, that loves the ling'ring tear;
With thoughts that mourn, nor yet desire relief,
With meek regret, and fond enduring grief;
With looks that speak—He never shall return!
Chilling thy tender bosom, clasp his urn!
And with soft sighs disperse th' irrev'rent dust,
Which time may strew upon his sacred bust.

THE END.
